Joint resolution (No. 22) requesting our Representatives in Congress to use their influence to have H. R. 7046 so amended as to except Vicksburg National Military Park Commission from its operations.

Whereas a bill has been introduced (H. Whereas the Chickamauga Park Commission, appointed September 1, 1890; the Gettysburg Park Commission, appointed May 25, 1893; and the Shiloh Park Commission, appointed January 15, 1895, have each been given sufficient time in which to practically complete the work committed to them; and

Whereas the Vicksburg National Military Park Commission was appointed March 1, 1899, and should not be terminated until the work which has been planned and which is now being executed under said Commission is completed; and

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have signed the joint resolution "instructing the Interstate Commerce Commission to make examinations into the subject of railroad discriminations and monopolies in coal and oil, and report on the same from time to time." I have signed it with hesitation, because in the form in which it was passed it achieves very little and may achieve nothing; and it is highly undesirable that a resolution of this kind shall become law in such form as to give the impression of insincerity—that is, of pretending to do something which really is not done. But after much hesitation I concluded to sign the resolution because its defects can be remedied by legislation which I hereby ask for; and it must be understood that unless this subsequent legislation is granted the present resolution must be mainly, and may be entirely, inoperative.

Before specifying what this legislation is I wish to call attention to one or two preliminary facts. In the first place, a part of the investigation requested by the House of Representatives in the resolution adopted February 15, 1905, relating to the oil industry, and a further part having to do with the anthracite-coal industry, has been for some time under investigation by the Department of Commerce and Labor. These investigations, I am informed, are approaching completion, and before Congress adjourns I shall submit to you the preliminary reports of these investigations. Until these reports are completed the Interstate Commerce Commission could not endeavor to carry out so much of the resolution of Congress as refers to the ground thus already covered without running the risk of seeing the two investigations conflict, and therefore render each other more or less nugatory. In the second place, I call your attention to the fact that if an investigation of the nature proposed in this joint resolution is thoroughly and effectively conducted, it will result in giving immunity from criminal prosecution to all persons who are called, sworn, and constrained by compulsory process of law to testify as witnesses, though of course such immunity from prosecution is not given to those from whom statements or information merely, in contradistinction to sworn testimony, is obtained.

This is not at all to say that such investigations should not be undertaken. Publicity can by itself often accomplish extraordinary results for good, and the court of public judgment may secure such results where the courts of law are powerless. There are many cases where an investigation securing complete publicity about abuses and giving Congress the material on which to proceed in the enactment of laws is more useful than a criminal prosecution can possibly be, but it should not be provided for by law without a clear understanding that it may be an alternative instead of an additional remedy—that is, that to carry on the investigation may serve as a bar to the successful prosecution of the offenses disclosed. The official body directed by Congress to make the investigation must of course carry out its direction, and therefore the direction should not be given without full appreciation of what it means.

But the direction contained in the joint resolution which I have signed will remain almost inoperative unless money is provided to carry out the investigations in question, and unless the Commission in carrying them out is authorized to administer oaths and compel the attendance of witnesses. As the resolution now is the Commission, which is very busy with its legitimate work and which has no extra money at its disposal, would be able to make the investigation only in the most partial and unsatisfactory manner; and, moreover, it is questionable whether it could, under this resolution, administer oaths at all or compel the attendance of witnesses. If this power were disputed by the parties investigated, the investigation would be help up for a year or two until the courts passed upon it, in which case, during the period of waiting, the Commission could only investigate to the extent and in the manner already provided under its organic law; so that the passage of the resolution would have achieved no good result whatever.

I accordingly recommend to Congress the serious consideration of just what they wish the Commission to do and how far they wish it to go, having in view the possible incompatibility of conducting an investigation like this and of also proceeding criminally in a court of law; and furthermore, that a sufficient sum, say $50,000, be at once added to the current appropriation for the Commission, so as to enable them to do the work indicated in a thorough and complete manner, while at the same time the power is explicitly conferred upon them to administer oaths and compel the attendance of witnesses in making the investigation in question, which covers work quite apart from their usual duties. It seems unwise to require an investigation by a commission and then not to furnish either the full legal power or the money, both of which are necessary to render the investigation effective.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 7, 1906.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I desire to premise what I shall say briefly—for I do not intend to talk long—by stating, with the greatest possible emphasis, that I deprecate and regret the necessity of commenting upon and criticising this extraordinary paper. Fate has recently enlisted me as an ally in the work of securing an adequate railroad rate regulation bill with the President; and as my whole heart and soul are dedicated to that work, and was so long before this year or last year, I do not want to appear to criticise the President or to do anything that will occasion any disruption of the amicable relations that now exist, or apparently exist. [Laughter.] But there are some things that, as a man and as a Senator, I can not put up with patiently. I wish to say, first, that I had the honor of introducing this resolution which has excited the Executive contempt and criticism. I introduced it in the committee, and it was reported from the committee unanimously. Therefore, while I wrote or copied it from the House resolution of Mr. GILLESPIE, with some additions which I thought were necessary, it is still my work. It first passed the Senate, and probably if it had not first passed the Senate it would never have passed the other branch of Congress. Therefore, I feel some personal responsibility for it. The committee adopted it and reported it unanimously, and therefore the committee is responsible for it; the Senate adopted it unanimously, and therefore the Senate is responsible for it. Therefore, as a Senator, I desire to call attention to some things in connection with this document.

In the first place, if I understand the English language at all, the President charges the Senate with pretending to do something with insincerity—if there is any great distinction—and, thirdly, with being ignorant of what it was trying to do. That is going a very great way in a very little while, and it is a large contract which the President has taken upon himself to justify these sweeping accusations.

If there is any point in the message at all, it lies in the fact, if it be a fact, that the resolution which we passed here—mind you, it was a joint resolution, and therefore a law, with all the force of any act of Congress—I say if there is any point in the criticism of the President, it is that that joint resolution does not go directly at a given purpose and define that purpose so clearly that it can not be misunderstood, and that there is inadequate power in it to accomplish the result had in view. Therefore, I will read those parts of the resolution which bear on this question. After the resolving words, instructing the Interstate Commerce Commission, and so forth, the resolution says:

First. Whether any common carriers by railroad, subject to the interstate-commerce act, or either of them, own or have any interest in, by means of stock ownership in other corporations or otherwise, any of the coal or oil which they, or either of them, directly or through other companies which they control or in which they have an interest, carry over their or any of their lines as common carriers, or in any manner own, control, or have any interest in coal lands or properties or oil lands or properties.

Second. Whether the officers of any of the carrier companies aforesaid, or any of them, or any person or persons charged with the duty of distributing cars or furnishing facilities to shippers are interested, either directly or indirectly, by means of stock ownership or otherwise in corporations or companies owning, operating, leasing, or otherwise interested in any coal mines, coal properties, or coal traffic, oil, oil properties, or oil traffic over the railroads with which they or any of them are connected or by which they or any of them are employed.

Third. Whether there is any contract, combination in the form of trust, or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, in which any common carrier engaged in the transportation of coal or oil is interested, or to which it is a party; and whether any such common carrier monopolizes or attempts to monopolize, or combines or conspires with any other carrier, company or companies, person or persons to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce in coal or oil, or traffic therein among the several States or with foreign nations, and whether or not, and if so, to what extent, such carriers, or any of them, limit or control, directly or indirectly, the output of coal mines or the price of coal and oil fields or the price of oil.

That is the way it passed, and that is the law.

Now, Mr. President, this resolution deals altogether with common carriers in their relation to the production, transportation, and marketing of coal and oil. Let us see whether or not this is not in effect and in actuality an amendment to the interstate-commerce law. It certainly has all the force of that law; and if that act, as originally passed and subsequently amended, embraces a provision which confers power upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to do the things and everything which this resolution authorizes, I want to know where the President gets a foundation for asserting that we have not already provided for the powers which he asks us to give him or for Congress to enact later, which is the subject of the message.

I now read from section 12 of the act of 1887 as amended——

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. As I read the President's message, it seems to me that the principal point he makes is that Congress failed to provide a sum of money——

Mr. TILLMAN. I will get to that presently.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. A sum of money necessary to conduct the investigation provided for by the joint resolution introduced by the Senator, and that there is no authority in the resolution, under which such an investigation can be successfully conducted. It seems to me that is the point.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will possess his soul in patience, I will say that while I have not yet reached those points, I am trying to get to them just as fast as I know how.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I have no doubt the Senator will come to them, but I merely wanted to call his attention to the fact that I think those are the principal points in the President's message.

Mr. TILLMAN. There are two points; one that there is no money, and the other that there is no power to administer oaths and send for persons and papers; and if there were not, there might be some danger of some of these rascals getting scot-free and not going to the penitentiary, or something like that. Those are the points the President is trying to make.

I was trying to read from the act of 1887, amended by the act of March 2, 1889, and amended by the act of February 10, 1891. Mind, you, I have already said that in effect this joint resolution is an amendment to the act to regulate commerce, because it relates to public carriers and authorizes the Commission, which has control of public carriers under the law, to do certain things by way of investigation.

Now, let us see what the original act says:

SEC. 12. That the Commission hereby created shall have authority to inquire into the management of the business of all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act, and shall keep itself informed as to the manner and method in which the same is conducted—

Here is the broad and sweeping provision of the original law covering this entire field, which we have authorized or ordered the Commission to investigate, and there is already law enough for the Commission to proceed under its original power to investigate along every line that we have laid down in this last resolution—and shall have the right to obtain from such common carriers full and complete information necessary to enable the Commission to perform the duties and carry out the objects for which it was created.

Further on in the same section this language occurs:

And for the purposes of this act the Commission shall have power to require, by subpœna, the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of all books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents relating to any matter under investigation.

There is the power already in the law to send for persons and papers and administer oaths; but that is not all. Further on section 20 of the act states:

SEC. 20. That the Commission is hereby authorized to require annual reports from all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act, to fix the time and prescribe the manner in which such reports shall be made, and to require from such carriers specific answers to all questions upon which the Commission may need information.

Is not that broad enough to cover the earth almost, as far as allowing the Commission to go into the business of these people and investigate all along any line relating to the public welfare in relation to the common carriers? But that is not all yet. For some reason—I do not know why—there was trouble about witnesses, and therefore Congress, on February 11, 1893, enacted the following specific provision:

That no person shall be excused from attending and testifying or from producing books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents before the Interstate Commerce Commission, or in obedience to the subpœna of the Commission, whether such subpœna be signed or issued by one or more Commissioners, or in any cause or proceeding, criminal or otherwise, based upon or growing out of any alleged violation of the act of Congress, entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, or of any amendment thereof on the ground or for the reason that the testimony or evidence, documentary or otherwise, required of him, may tend to criminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture. But no person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing, concerning which he may testify or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, before said Commission, or in obediennce to its subpœna, or the subpœna of either of them, or in any such case or proceeding: Provided, That no person so testifying shall be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying.

Any person who shall neglect or refuse to attend and testify, or to answer any lawful inquiry, or to produce books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents, if in his power to do so, in obedience to the subpœna or lawful requirement of the Commission shall be guilty of an offense, and upon conviction thereof by a court of competent jurisdiction shall be punished by fine not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Here is a supplemental power.

Mr. BACON. On what page is that?

Mr. TILLMAN. Page 22 of the act to regulate commerce, as published by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Here is the sweeping, drastic provision passed after there had been some trouble with the original proposition or the original grant of power, in which the Commission is granted the most complete remedy in regard to witnesses in administering oaths and sending for persons and papers in pursuance of its duty to investigate and obtain information in relation to these public carriers and any act of theirs in restraint of trade by conspiracy or otherwise.

Therefore—I may be mistaken, but it seems to me that it can not be disputed—the Interstate Commerce Commission now has the fullest possible power, as much as we could give it if we passed an act here every day for the next twelve months, to investigate any and every thing which it is ordered to investigate under this last resolution, because this resolution refers to matters that are unlawful, that are in restraint of trade, which relate to rebates, which relate to conspiracies, to combinations, and all that kind of thing.

To my mind, it is an insult for the President to send a message here telling us we did not know what we were trying to do, and that we were exercising or using insincerity in dealing with a great and important question like this. But let us see how much further the President goes. He says:

In the first place, a part of the investigation requested by the House of Representatives in the resolution adopted February 15, 1905, relating to the oil industry, and a further part having to do with the anthracite-coal industry, has been for some time under investigation by the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Well, here is the resolution of February 15, 1906, which I will read. It was passed by the House of Representatives. This is not a joint resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he is hereby, requested to investigate the cause or causes of the low price of crude oil or petroleum in the United States, and especially in the Kansas field, and the unusually large margins between the price of crude oil or petroleum and the selling price of refined oil and its by-products, and whether the said conditions have resulted in whole or in part from any contract, combination, in the form of a trust, or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade and commerce among the several States and Territories, or with foreign countries; also whether the said prices have been controlled, in whole or in part, by any corporation, joint stock company, or corporate combination engaged in commerce among the several States and Territories, or with foreign nations, also whether such corporation, joint stock company, or corporate combination, in purchasing crude oil or petroleum, by any order or practice of discrimination, boycotts, blacklists, or in any manner discriminates against any particular oil field; also to investigate the organization, capitalization, profits, conduct, and management of the business of such corporation or corporations, company or companies, and corporate combinations, if any, and to make early report of its findings, according to law, to the end that such information may be used by Congress as a basis for legislation, or by the Department of Justice as a basis for legal proceedings.

There is not a solitary word in this House resolution about coal. It has no force of law, as it simply requests, although in the House that is the usual form. It uses the word "requested."

The Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he is hereby, requested.

We usually direct the heads of Departments at this end of the Capitol. But the President speaks of the investigation by the Department of Commerce and Labor as already under way, and says he will send us the results of that investigation soon. He mentions that that investigation includes coal, when the resolution does not ask it to include coal, and when we—the Senate and the House of Representatives—in pursuance of our constitutional rights, having passed an act or a joint resolution, which has the force of an act, instructing the Interstate Commerce Commission to do certain things, we are scolded, and in a manner insulted, by being charged with insincerity, pretense, and ignorance. I can only say that the President must have been misinformed and miserably advised by somebody who ought to have seen to the matter. Of course, I know the President personally may not be able to take the time to investigate, but he has innumerable helpers in the Department of Justice, as well, also, in the Executive Mansion, and he should have had somebody to advise him. I am not a lawyer; I am only a farmer, but I know enough to understand—and I have not had anybody to help me work up this case—but anybody with common sense could have discovered that there was no real foundation or reason for the President sending us any such message as that.

Let us look a little into the money question. How do any of the Departments of the Government regularly constituted, like the Interstate Commerce Commission, get their money, their appropriations? Here is the only authorized and lawful way for them to get any money. The act of July 7, 1884 (24 Stats., p. 284), in the last part of the paragraph, provides:

And hereafter all estimates of appropriations and estimates of deficiencies in appropriations intended for the consideration and seeking the action of any of the committees of Congress shall be transmitted to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury, and in no other manner; and the said Secretary shall first cause the same to be properly classified, compiled, indexed, and printed, under the supervision of the chief of division of warrants, estimates, and appropriations of his Department.

When the estimates go to the Committee on Appropriations the amount asked for is investigated by that committee, and if they approve it the item goes into some appropriation bill—usually the sundry civil bill in such a case as this, I believe—and any deficiency that might be in existence or impending in the Interstate Commerce Commission would, of course, be amply provided for in the regular appropriation bill whenever we passed it. It is therefore child's play, if I may use such a term, to talk to us about having been insincere and making a pretense of an investigation because we did not appropriate money directly in the joint resolution which directs a Department of the Government, already in existence and acting under the laws which control it, to investigate along this specific line; and, as I have heretofore said, it already had full authority under the original act to have investigated every solitary thing which we have ordered them to investigate in this resolution. Therefore the Commission has the power of sending for persons and papers already vested in it, and it would have been absurd to have placed in this resolution a provision specifically authorizing the Commission to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and so forth.

But there is still something else. This investigation, which was ordered by this Congress under this resolution, deals with public carriers and their relation to trade and to producers. Now, let us see how far the Department of Commerce and Labor has any right to touch that question at all. The President says that it is already investigating under a resolution of the House. Let us see what the law says. Section 6 of the act of February 14, 1903, provides that—

The said Commissioner—

That is, the Commissioner of Labor—

The said Commissioner shall have power and authority to make, under the direction and control of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, diligent investigation into the organization, conduct, and management of the business of any corporation, joint stock company, or corporate combination engaged in commerce among the several States and with foreign nations, excepting common carriers subject to "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887.

Mr. Garfield, if he is investigating the common carriers in relation to the transportation of coal and oil or anything else, is absolutely outside of his jurisdiction, and is meddling with something with which he has no concern.

I have here certain opinions of the Supreme Court as to the power and jurisdiction and duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I will not take the trouble to read them, because they are merely amplifications and interpretations of the language, so broad and sweeping that they merely fortify the position I have taken in regard to the power of that Department of the Government. But I will print them as a part of my remarks unless there is objection.

The opinions referred to are as follows:

Mr. Justice Brewer, in the Maximum Freight Rate decision (167 U. S., 479), said:

It [the Commission] is charged with the general duty of inquiring as to the management of the business of railroad companies and to keep itself informed as to the manner in which the same is conducted, and has the right to compel complete and full information as to the manner in which such carriers are transacting their business. * * * It must also see that publicity, which is required by section 6, is observed by the railroad companies.

Mr. Justice Harlan, in 168 United States, 144, said:

The Commission was established to protect the public against improper practices of transportation companies engaged in commerce among the several States.

Mr. Justice Day, in the recently decided Baird case (194 U. S., 25), makes the following observation:

The inquiry of a board of the character of the Interstate Commerce Commission should not be too narrowly constrained by technical rules as to the admissibility of proof. Its function is largely one of investigation, and it should not be hampered in making inquiry pertaining to interstate commerce by those narrow rules which prevail in trials at common law, where a strict correspondence is required between allegation and proof. * * *

To unreasonably hamper the Commission by narrowing its field of inquiry beyond the requirements of the due protection of rights of citizens will be to seriously impair its usefulness and prevent a realization of the salutary purposes for which it was established by Congress.

Circuit Judge Taft, in 99 Federal Reports, 52, said:

It has been suggested that traffic managers are much better able, by reason of their knowledge and experience, to fix rates, and to decide what discriminations are justified by the circumstances, than courts. This can not be conceded, so far as it relates to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which by reason of the experience of its members in this kind of controversy and their great opportunity for full information is, in a sense, an expert tribunal.

Judge Shiras, in the Social Circle case (162 U. S., 184), said:

The purposes of the act call for a full inquiry by the Commission into all the circumstances and conditions pertinent to the questions involved.

Mr. TILLMAN. There is little more I care to say at present; but I feel that it is a misfortune that the President should have been so rash and lacking in discretion, if I may use the word, in dealing with the Senate. It is not the first time he has presumed to lecture us. I recall two or three messages in which he has spoken in terms of criticism and complaint. Once, I recollect, a couple of years ago I think it was, in regard to some bills relating to the Navy, the Naval Committee had received his message or his letter. We had considered it, and the legislation that he requested had passed the bodies and had gone to him; but there was so much carelessness around the Executive Office that he did not know that, and he sent a message here in which he scolded us for not attending to his wishes.

Now, as I said, I pardon a great deal to the immense burden that is on the man; I pardon his impetuosity; but there are limits to human patience; and the President ought to recollect that the Senate has some rights and privileges, and he ought not, at least lightly and flippantly, to insult us.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have often observed that those who are most ready and most severe in criticism are the most sensitive when they are themselves criticised. I do not myself see how the President of the United States could have treated this resolution, for which I voted, otherwise than he has done unless he had vetoed it. This resolution belongs to a common class, and everyone who has been in Congress for any length of time must have observed a great many like it. Some subject is fashionable and occupying the public mind. It is desired to show that our sentiments are right on this subject, and then comes a resolution. The subjects vary from winter to winter. I remember one year it was considered very desirable that we should have ardent resolutions passed about the Armenians and denouncing the oppressions that were suffered by that unfortunate people. So we had a number of excellent resolutions of varying degrees of violence which showed the warmth of our hearts, effected nothing, and did no harm. There was another period in the Senate, I recollect, when we passed a number of admirable resolutions in favor of peace and arbitration, but when we got down to the practical question of arbitration treaties the treaties did not pass.

Yet I do not think we were insincere. It does not follow that because we have assented to certain loose and general propositions we are therefore committed to every kind of practical legislation which may be offered. A resolution which thunders in the index and shows that we are properly aroused to the dangers arising from corporations generally and from railroads in particular, and which does not commit us to any specific legislation, is one very easy to vote for. There does not seem to be much object in defeating it or in arguing about it, and so it goes through loosely drawn and without careful consideration.

Now, this joint resolution ought not to have any existence whatever if what the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] says about the existing law is true. If the Interstate Commerce Commission have full power to do all that this resolution requires, then Congress has placed itself in the somewhat foolish attitude of reenacting existing law.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Massachusetts pardon me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. What is known as the "Elkins law" is largely, if not wholly, in so far as its enforcement goes, under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice. The Interstate Commerce Commission probably felt that it would be invading the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice if it undertook to go into this specific line of investigation, and it was unwilling to undertake it without authority or instruction. The joint resolution is a little broader than the usual jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, inasmuch as it deals with the question of the ownership of coal lands by railroad companies and the control of the coal market by reason of such ownership and monopoly. For these reasons the joint resolution was passed.

I will say, that so far from having any insincere purpose, or pretending about it, I was very anxious and solicitous to get some direct and positive information bearing on all those questions in regard to the monopoly of coal lands and the refusal of railroads to make connections with spur lines. I therefore earnestly desired the specific investigation, and wanted it at once, in order that we might have the facts sworn to instead of memorials and letters such as that of the governor of West Virginia and the letter of the Red Rock Fuel Company, relating to abuses in the coal trade. I earnestly desired that we should have this specific investigation, in order that Congress might have the facts, and before the session ends, probably, be able to put into the law which is under contemplation to be enacted, something that would give relief from this intolerable condition in West Virginia.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not question in the least the Senator's sincerity. I am just as guilty as he is in having voted for the joint resolution. It passed unanimously. It belongs, as I have tried to explain, to a class of resolutions which in themselves I do not think are very sincere, or rather, I should say, very carefully considered. I think such resolutions are passed largely because they happen to catch the fancy of the moment. But when this resolution reached the President he was bound to consider the very practical question as to how he was to make it effective, and he found it sadly deficient.

But the Senator in what he just said admits specifically what I have already stated in explaining why it was passed—that it was broader than the existing law, that it was new legislation. Either the Interstate Commerce Commission had already all the powers which this joint resolution gives or it had not. If the Interstate Commerce Commission already had all the powers that the joint resolution, which of course is a law, proposes to give, then a mere request for information, a simple Senate resolution would have given us all the information, and the Commission would have been obliged under existing law to do all that is demanded by the resolution. But the moment we pass a new law we either put ourselves in the attitude of reenacting existing law or we admit that new legislation is needed.

Now, looking at section 12 of the interstate-commerce act and the powers there given, I think it is very clear that this joint resolution does give additional powers to and impose new duties upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. I do not think the original act contemplated investigation into the ownership of oil fields or of coal mines, still less into the ownership of stocks in any other company by officers of railroads. Therefore, in order to enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to make these inquiries, I am inclined to think that new legislation was necessary. We passed that new legislation here in this resolution. If it is new legislation, possibly the old grant of power to summon witnesses would be sufficient, and there would be no need of giving that authority specifically when we conferred new powers; but I think it is a point that might well be made against the resolution.

But, however this may be, it is perfectly clear to my mind that it is impossible to carry on an investigation of the scope and extent called for without additional funds. There ought to have been an appropriation with the resolution, as is constantly done when resolutions ordering investigations are passed. Without the appropriation the resolution does not seem very serious or at all practical, and this suggests insincerity. The Interstate Commerce Commission is a body of only five men. It has an immense burden of work. In addition to the duties imposed upon it by law, it has been very actively engaged in promoting additional legislation for enlargement of its own powers, and here we are demanding that it make at once an inquiry which would tax the resources of the Census Bureau. To look into all these railroad ownerships; to look into all the relations of railroads to coal and oil transportation opens an immense field of inquiry, and it seems to me we ought to have added the $50,000, or whatever sum is necessary, to enable the Commission to make the inquiry properly and rapidly.

The President, of course, could have vetoed the joint resolution and given substantially the same reasons for doing so as those with which he has accompanied his approval. He thought it better, desiring to promote the inquiry, to send in with his approval a statement as to what additional legislation he deemed necessary in order to make the law effective. It seems to me that this complaint of the President's criticising the Congress is beside the mark. Does anybody deny the constitutional right of the President to veto a bill and give his reasons therefor? And yet what is a veto, except the severest possible criticism? I have never heard the suggestion for one moment that the exercise of that constitutional power is something out of the province of the Executive or in bad taste or in any way improper.

Instead of that he has acted with Congress, so far as he could, in signing the joint resolution, a joint resolution which, as I have said, admits by its very existence that the present law is insufficient, and he has explained to Congress what is being done in the direction covered by the resolution, and has also pointed out what further legislation he thinks necessary in order to make the law effective. He would have been derelict in his duty if he had not done so. One of the suggestions he makes is that the Interstate Commerce Commission should have specific power in these cases covered by the resolution to subpœna witnesses, administer oaths, etc. Whether that is necessary or not, in view of the old law, I will not pretend to say. The President thinks it "questionable," and I suppose he had good legal advice upon that point. As to the appropriation, which is not a legal question, I have no hesitation in saying that the joint resolution as it stands, and admitting its necessity, is, without money to carry on the investigation, little more than waste paper. It would have been simply disingenuous for the Executive to have signed the joint resolution without comment and then allowed it to rust away in the archives of the Interstate Commerce Commission, for it would have been absolutely impossible for them, with their present force, to carry on any such inquiry.

Mr. FORAKER obtained the floor.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Ohio yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. In response to the intimation of the Senator from Massachusetts, I will say that I was told upon inquiry that the Interstate Commerce Commission had ample funds to begin this inquiry, and as Congress in the joint resolution expressly ordered the Commission at the earliest possible moment to begin it, that was all that was necessary. It stands to reason that under the law the Commission knew that if it needed more money all it would have to do would be to signify to the Secretary of the Treasury, according to law, how much it would require, and he would transmit an estimate to Congress, and Congress would grant it without a word.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator has sources of information about the funds of the Interstate Commerce Commission which I do not possess. But it seems to me the President, who is responsible as the Chief Executive for an inquiry like this, whether made by the Interstate Commerce Commission or not, is probably not making his statement in regard to the funds necessary as a mere matter of guesswork. I think if the Senator would pursue his inquiry he would find that the President was well informed upon that subject.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I do not rise to discuss the joint resolution or the message of the President other than to say that when the joint resolution was adopted, in so far as it occurred to me at all, I assumed, as doubtless other Senators did, that we were requiring a duty of a body which already had authority under the law to administer oaths, to make examinations, to send for persons and papers, and to exercise every other power necessary to be exercised to make this a successful investigation.

So far as an appropriation is concerned, I do not recall that it entered my mind at the time, but if it had come into my mind I should have concluded then, as I conclude now, that the Interstate Commerce Commission being so directed, if it needed any funds beyond those already appropriated, would make known its desire for a further appropriation, and the Congress would of course respond promptly, as it always does, making such appropriation as in the estimation of the Commission might be necessary to enable it to do what we had required it to do.

The point I rose to speak about is the passage in the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], in which he said that the joint resolution was adopted as a matter of course, as one of a class of resolutions that nobody seriously had in mind, or words to that effect. Mr. President, the joint resolution was not so treated in committee, where it was carefully considered, nor was it so treated in the Senate, as I understood at the time, by Senators who voted for it. The purpose of the joint resolution is to ascertain facts, as the Senator from South Carolina has well said, necessary for the Congress to have to enable it to act intelligently in breaking up what I regard as the greatest evil connected with the common-carrier system of this country as common carriers have been operated.

I do not believe that a common carrier should be engaged in any business except only that of a common carrier. I do not believe that a common carrier should be allowed to own coal mines and operate them, except only possibly where they have a vested right with which we have no power to interfere. I do not believe they should be allowed to engage in any other business. Their business should be solely and exclusively that of common carriers. All other businesses should be carried on by other people, and every man who carries on the business of a coal operator or any other kind of business should feel and know that he has exactly the same right with respect to the carriage of his product that every other man has who has occasion to patronize the carriers of the country.

This has been for many years a grievous evil. It has been complained of throughout the country. I have had it called to my attention repeatedly, and the time is here now, and ripe for it, if we propose to do something to put the common-carrier business of the country upon a better footing, to investigate this matter and investigate it thoroughly, in order that we may act intelligently. I would have preferred that a committee appointed by the Congress should make the investigation, but that, under the great pressure of business of the session, seemed impossible, and it was referred, by common consent, to the Interstate Commerce Commission, thinking they were more familiar with the general subject than any of the Members of either House probably are; that they could act in making the investigation along the line of their general duties; that they could take such time as might be needed, and that they already had, in a sense, all the facilities necessary for proceeding intelligently and successfully.

I voted for the joint resolution not insincerely, but sincerely, because I believed it to be a step in the direction of curing the most grievous wrong of all the wrongs that are complained of against the railroads.

Mr. SPOONER obtained the floor.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I merely wish to say a single word in regard to what the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] said.

I agree entirely with the Senator from Ohio as to the importance of putting a stop to this ownership of outside properties by railroad companies. I agree entirely with the view taken by the Supreme Court on that subject. I did not know that we were discussing the merits of the question. My point was that Congress passes a great many resolutions of that kind very loosely, without stopping to see that they are perfected and that they carry with them the necessary machinery. That was the only point I desired to make. I do not disagree in the least with the importance of the question or of the investigation.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, a few words on this subject. I think an examination of the joint resolution makes it perfectly obvious that it failed to receive from the Senate that care which the importance of the subject demanded. So far as concerns the matter of politeness between the executive and the legislative departments, I do not care to say anything except that it is a fundamental proposition that the coordinate branches of the Government shall treat each other with courtesy, and it is of the greatest consequence that that rule never should be violated. If it has been violated at any time it has been, I think, much violated by the Senate in years past in permitting observations to be made here in harsh criticism of the executive and judicial departments of the Government.

I do not think it is a fair construction of the President's message to say that it charges insincerity upon the Congress in the passage of the joint resolution or upon anyone who had to do with its introduction or its passage. The President was obliged by the resolution—because it was a joint resolution, which, under the Constitution, required his approval—to sign it, if it was to become a law; and the President may very well be excused for not wishing, if he has correctly construed the joint resolution, to be a participant in legislation which seemed to be intended to accomplish something in the public interest which he was convinced it did not accomplish. And so the President says very properly:

> I have signed it with hesitation, because in the form in which it was passed it achieves very little and may achieve nothing; and it is highly undesirable that a resolution of this kind shall become law in such form as to give the impression of insincerity—> that is, of pretending to do something which really is not done.

The resolution, in my opinion, would not do what on its face it purports to do. It would not confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission power to do several things which explicitly it purports to confer upon the Commission; and the President, in signing it, might very well say with propriety what he has said as to the resolution, and it is a far cry from that to a statement by the President in a message that the Congress has been insincere about it or has pretended to do something which it did not really intend should be accomplished.

Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] says this law is an amendment to the interstate-commerce law. The Senator is obliged to so contend in order to find in the interstate-commerce act or any of its amendments authority for the Commission—and I doubt if it would be found there then—to do some of the things which the joint resolution seems to have intended to impose upon the Commission. The interstate-commerce law is very plain. Its object was plain. Its object was to regulate common carriers engaged in interstate transportation. Its object was to secure the administration, in respect of rates, of the common-law rules upon the subject, which upon that subject, as upon a great many other subjects, are the perfection, so far as principle is concerned, of human wisdom.

I have glanced hastily through this act. I find nothing in it which authorizes the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate with reference to whether a monopoly in coal has been created or as to whether a monopoly in oil has been created.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. I will yield in a moment.

Let me read this:

> Third. Whether there is any contract, combination in the form of trust, or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, in which any common carrier engaged in the transportation of coal or oil is interested, or to which it is a party; and whether any such common carrier monopolizes or attempts to monopolize, or combines or conspires with any other carrier, company or companies, person or persons to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce in coal or oil, or traffic therein among the several States or with foreign nations, and whether or not, and if so, to what extent, such carriers, or any of them, limit or control, directly or indirectly, the output of coal mines or the price of coal and oil fields or the price of oil.

I find nothing in the interstate-commerce law tending to confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to investigate or deal with some of the matters referred to there.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Everybody knows how inadequate is my legal information or acumen to deal with the Senator from Wisconsin when he gets to his strong suit of——

Mr. SPOONER. Special pleading. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes. But I want to ask the Senator a question. If the interstate-commerce law, as it is now on the statute books, has in two specific enactments conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to send for persons and papers, and to compel witnesses to attend, and to administer oaths, and all of that, which the President says we ought to give again, and if its general jurisdiction is that of investigating the affairs of common carriers which transport products by railroad, which the act says, would it not have been surplusage and more or less redundancy and idiocy to have put it into the joint resolution and for a third time to have the Interstate Commerce Commission empowered to send for persons and papers?

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator from South Carolina had studied law, as he ought to have done, he would not put such a question to me.

One question is, Mr. President, and of it I have little doubt, that the joint resolution is absolutely defective in not conferring specifically upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power necessary to carry on this investigation in its full scope. There are matters here which probably the Interstate Commerce Commission could institute and carry on without any added power conferred by the joint resolution, although that Commission is authorized to summon witnesses and to make investigations only for the purpose of enabling them to discharge the duties imposed upon them by that act.

Mr. TILLMAN. But do we not give them additional duties and additional powers in the joint resolution?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; you give them additional duties, but you do not give them the additional power to correspond to the additional duties. You attempt to enlarge the interstate-commerce act by a joint resolution to include some of the antitrust act. The Senator must not think that because a carrier engaged in interstate commerce happens to be interested in a contract in restraint of trade it therefore falls within the interstate-commerce act. The merger sought by the Northern Pacific and the Great Northern was not prosecuted under the interstate-commerce act, although both of the parties to it were carriers engaged in interstate commerce. It was not overthrown because of anything in the interstate-commerce act. It was overthrown because the Supreme Court of the United States had decided against the contention of the railroads of the country that the antitrust act included railroads. It was overthrown because it was in violation of the antitrust act as being a combination in the form of a trust or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States.

Mr. TILLMAN. Do not the words the Senator has just read give the Interstate Commerce Commission as now constituted full authority to investigate everything we have ordered it to investigate in the joint resolution?

Mr. SPOONER. These words are not in the interstate-commerce act. The Interstate Commerce Commission was never charged with the administration of the antitrust act, whether the violation of the antitrust act was by carriers or otherwise. We have conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to make investigation, with power to compel the attendance of witnesses, with power to take depositions as to all matters which will enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to discharge the duties imposed by that act upon it, and no further.

Mr. TILLMAN. Suppose I were to inform the Senator from Wisconsin that, so far from having the power conferred by the new enactment to send for persons and papers, there are probably 500 men in Pennsylvania, Maryland, and West Virginia who are clamoring for an opportunity to be heard and to produce the evidence to show that they have been robbed systematically and discriminated against by these people?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; that has nothing to do——

Mr. TILLMAN. Why do you contend for the right to send for persons and papers and to give money when the witnesses are begging to be heard and to be given an opportunity in a tribunal to have the matter investigated?

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, that obviously has nothing whatever to do with the question. The railroad officers and agents are not "begging to be heard." The President has signed this joint resolution. He desires to carry it into effect, as does every man who voted for it. You will find no difference of opinion in the Congress, so far as I have heard, as to the necessity for breaking up this combination of ownership of interstate carriers in the production of the necessaries of life—none whatever. The President simply calls our attention to the fact that the joint resolution we sent to him is inadequate.

Mr. TILLMAN. In his judgment.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, it is inadequate in my judgment, and it is a question for the Senate to determine whether it is inadequate in its judgment. If the Senator is right that it is an amendment to the interstate-commerce law, it has an effect which certainly he did not intend it to have upon the antitrust law. But it is not an amendment of any law. The interstate-commerce law is a permanent law. This joint resolution, Mr. President, is temporary.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is a law as all laws are, permanent until they are repealed.

Mr. SPOONER. No; all laws are not permanent. Some laws are to require a certain thing to be done, which being done ends it.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the law still stands, does it not?

Mr. SPOONER. Does this law intend that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall keep on for the next forty years in an investigation of this kind?

Mr. TILLMAN. If it is necessary. They would have authority, if new conditions arose under which the same abuses existed, to take that old law and root it out from the cloud of dust under which it might have been buried for fifty years. Until repealed it is a law. I am lawyer enough to know that, and the Senator from Wisconsin can not deny it.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not want the Senator to attempt in this public way to intimidate me. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator knows he is just getting off an old joke on that proposition. [Laughter in the galleries.] I am not trying to intimidate him, and he knows that I am not.

Mr. SPOONER. The situation calls for the joke.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin will please suspend. It is the duty of the Chair to admonish the occupants of the galleries that manifestations of any kind are not allowed under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I merely wanted to ask the Senator a question. The Senator from South Carolina spoke of the Red Rock Fuel Company, of which we have heard a great deal. If the Interstate Commerce Commission has now all the power that the joint resolution gives it, why is it necessary to save them by a new law?

Mr. TILLMAN. In regard to the Red Rock Fuel Company, I will state——

Mr. LODGE. I did not ask the question of the Senator from South Carolina. I asked the question of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me, I will answer it. [Laughter.]

The Red Rock Fuel Company went to the Interstate Commerce Commission under the law, made its complaint, had its hearing, got its judgment. The judgment went to the court for enforcement, and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad said, "We will not do it." There you have got it.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, so far as the ownership by interstate carriers of coal mines or the ownership by the officers of interstate-commerce carriers of coal mines operates for discrimination, as it does in an infamous way, that is within the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission now. So far as it operates in certain other respects it is within the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The joint resolution, then, would simply be an injunction upon the Commission to investigate and report. So far as it goes beyond that and deals with combinations and conspiracies in restraint of trade affecting the price of coal to the general consumer throughout the United States, affecting the price of oil to consumers in the United States, by limiting the output of coal mines and oil wells, it goes beyond anything in the interstate-commerce law, and the Senator ought to know it.

Mr. TILLMAN. If it had not gone beyond and added to the powers already in the interstate-commerce law there would have been no purpose in passing it. It directs the Commission to do a specific thing, because we want to know.

Mr. SPOONER. But, Mr. President, if it had simply set in motion by a joint resolution the investigating power of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to matters already within its jurisdiction, then nobody could have said that the resolution was defective in not conferring power to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths and compel the attendance of witnesses. But when it goes beyond that and fails to include the power, either by reference to the interstate-commerce act or independently, in the Commission to compel the attendance of witnesses and to administer oaths, then it is defective in just the particular that the President claims in his message that it is defective, and to that extent it might be a "water haul," that is all.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator mean to be understood to say that if by a proper enactment the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission to make investigations is enlarged by the addition of another subject, it is necessary for the statute making that enlargement to reconfer upon the Commission the power to send for witnesses?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not.

Mr. BACON. That is exactly this case.

Mr. SPOONER. That is not exactly this case. This is a joint resolution instructing the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate some matters which are now within its jurisdiction.

Mr. BACON. Then, if the Senator will pardon me, it must be one of two things. It is either an enlargement of the jurisdiction, in which case, under the statement just made by the Senator, reconferring the power to send for persons and papers would not be necessary, or it is a direction under the present law. In either case the repetition of this power is not necessary.

Mr. SPOONER. It bears on its face indubitable evidence that it is not an amendment of the interstate-commerce law at all. It is just what it would have been if it had been a concurrent resolution calling upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to make the investigation here indicated. What is the object? It is to investigate and report—

That said Commission be required to make this investigation at its earliest possible convenience and to furnish the information above required from time to time and as soon as it can be done consistent with the performance of its public duty.

That said Commission be also required to report as to what remedy it can suggest to cure the evils above set forth, if they exist.

Mr. President, in the execution of this joint resolution the most skillful lawyers in the United States will be employed to obstruct it. A law has to be very plain in conferring power upon a body to warrant imprisonment for contempt, and where the jurisdiction has to be spelled out, where it is not clear, as it ought to be clear, the courts will not do it. If this matter is one of doubt, as it is in the mind of the President, in the mind of his Attorney-General, in the minds of Senators, who are just as anxious to have it made strong and perfect as the Senator from South Carolina surely is, why project this investigation with power attempted to be conferred in words utterly inadequate or liable to be so held? Why not do what the President recommends in a respectful way to the Congress? Why not make it perfectly clear.

Mr. President, it is the intention of Congress to confer this power so that no man can defy the authorities, a subpœna having been issued, by a refusal to testify. That is all there is to it. The money part of it is nothing, for Congress could have appropriated the money by joint resolution at any time, and it ought to appropriate the money. The President did right to call attention to it. I think he was——

Mr. BACON. Was it necessary to appropriate it in the joint resolution?

Mr. SPOONER. No, sir; it was not. But with the haste that the joint resolution enjoined it would have been wiser to have appropriated it in the resolution unless inquiry had first developed the fact that an appropriation already existed from which the expenditure could be made. That is another evidence of a little too much haste in passing the joint resolution.

Mr. BACON. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that there are numerous amendments to the original law enlarging the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and in no one of them was there ever an appropriation at the time made for the purpose of carrying it out.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator think that an appropriation is necessary?

Mr. BACON. I do, but I do not think it was either necessary or wise to put it in the joint resolution.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator think the money is at hand now without an appropriation?

Mr. BACON. If not, the ordinary way of getting it would be through an appropriation bill, and that was ready at hand.

Mr. SPOONER. I suppose the President knows whether it is or not, and by this recommendation he conveys delicately to Congress, I should think, the information that it is not.

Mr. BACON. As the Senator well knows, these appropriations are made in the regular appropriation bills. He can not find anywhere in the legislation of Congress that special appropriations have been made to carry out the purposes of the interstate-commerce law in the amendments of the original act.

Mr. SPOONER. This is what the President says:

As the resolution now is the Commission, which is very busy with its legitimate work and which has no extra money at its disposal, would be able to make the investigation only in the most partial and unsatisfactory manner; and, moreover, it is questionable whether it could, under this resolution, administer oaths at all or compel the attendance of witnesses.

I agree to that proposition. So the President says—

If this power were disputed by the parties investigated—

And does anybody doubt that it will be disputed?

Mr. TILLMAN. I have already told the Senator that there are a cloud of witnesses begging to be heard under the wrongs which they have endured. I suppose the other side will bring something to try to rebut it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Texas yield to me for one moment only?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. The President says:

If this power were disputed by the parties investigated, the investigation would be held up for a year or two until the courts passed upon it, in which case, during the period of waiting, the Commission could only investigate to the extent and in the manner already provided under its organic law; so that the passage of the resolution would have achieved no good result whatever.

I agree to that.

Mr. ELKINS. Will the Senator from Texas allow me to make a statement about this matter?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. ELKINS. It will not take a minute.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well.

Mr. ELKINS. I wish to make a statement on the question which has been under discussion before the Senate.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will wait and bring it up again. Some of the rest of us want to say something.

Mr. ELKINS. If anybody else is going to bring it up, very well. I did not know that that was the intention.

Mr. BACON. Not now; but let us wait until another time, so that all may have a chance to speak on it.

Mr. ELKINS. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unfinished business will be proceeded with.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, on the 26th of February I offered a bill in the nature of a substitute for the bill which has been reported from the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce. The substitute occupies common ground with the committee bill to the extent of proposing to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission. There is material difference, however, in other particulars between the bill which I propose and the bill reported by the committee.

The bill which I propose, among other things, will restore the punishment of imprisonment against persons who give and persons who receive rebates. In addition, the bill which I propose contains important provisions on the central proposition involved in this discussion, that conferring emergency powers on the Interstate Commerce Commission, and I will read that section of the bill for the information of the Senate, as I have perfected it.

That whenever the Interstate Commerce Commission, created by "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and exercising powers thereunder and under acts amendatory thereof, and under this act, shall, upon complaint and hearing, as provided by said acts, or either of them, decide that any rate fixed for service which is subject to the provisions of said acts, or either of them, is unjust and unreasonable, said Commission shall have the power, and it shall be its duty, to fix a just and reasonable rate for such service and make an order specifying the time, which shall be within thirty days from the date of said order, when such rate shall take effect; and thereafter such rate shall be the only lawful rate which the carrier may charge for such service for the period of one year from the time such rate may become operative, unless otherwise ordered by the Commission: Provided, That if such rate so fixed by the Commission is confiscatory of the property of the carrier, the carrier affected or any stock or bond holder thereof may proceed against said Commission by appropriate proceedings in equity in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction to enjoin the enforcement of such order and rate; and in such proceedings either party to the suit may appeal immediately and directly to the Supreme Court of the United States from the final decree therein or from any interlocutory or temporary restraining order therein by which the enforcement of the rate or order so established and made by the Commission is enjoined in whole or in part, and said case so appealed shall be advanced and take precedence in the Supreme Court of the United States of all cases of a different character therein pending: Provided further, That in determining what is a just and reasonable rate and what is a confiscatory rate no consideration shall be given fictitious stock issued by the carrier, or bonds or other obligations of the carrier issued in excess of the fair value of its property.

Mr. President, what I shall say to-day will have reference to the bill which I have proposed, and particularly it will have reference to the central question involved in the bill and in the committee bill to create emergency powers in the Interstate Commerce Commission.

It has been suggested that an effective measure by Congress for the regulation of commerce may tend to trench upon the Democratic doctrine of State rights. To my mind that involves undue apprehension or a misconception of that doctrine. To the political belief which would preserve unimpaired all the reserved rights of the States within the true meaning and spirit of the Constitution my adherence has always been given, and my loyalty to it will continue until the end, because it is based upon historic truth, upon a just interpretation of the Constitution, and upon sound political philosophy.

What that faith is in its relation to the party creed and to the particular question under debate it is important to understand, at least in its general aspect. Fundamentally the faith of the Democratic party rests upon inherent principles of liberty, of which free government itself is not the source, but only the expression. So far as that faith, in its narrower scope, is founded in our dual system of State and Federal Governments, so far as it depends upon the construction of the Federal Constitution, it was stated in its breadth and fullness by Jefferson in his first inaugural address, that great paper which, read in connection with the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution, is the charter of the Democratic party. There he declared that the essential principles of our Government, which pertain to this question, consist "in the support of the State governments in all their rights as the most competent administrations for our domestic concerns, and the surest bulwarks against antirepublican tendencies" and "the preservation of the General Government in its whole constitutional vigor as the sheet anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad."

Not only the outward form, but the broad spirit of this statement of Democratic faith, meets now, and has always met, my unqualified approval. In their respective spheres the State and Federal governments are supreme, and the supremacy of each, the Federal as well as the State governments, should be steadfastly maintained. The reserved powers of the States, the powers not delegated to the Federal Government, but which remain in the States or in the people, comprising the great mass of governmental functions, should be absolutely free from Federal interference and control, while the limited and enumerated powers delegated by the Constitution to the Federal Government should be equally upheld and sustained. While it is the duty of the Democratic party to maintain inviolate all the reserved rights of the States, it is also its duty to sustain the undoubted powers of the Federal Government in their whole constitutional strength. In my judgment, the doctrine of concurrent power in the State and Federal governments, except where expressly given, is without warrant in the Constitution, although it is sometimes supported by the highest judicial authority.

But, Mr. President, it is not my purpose to enter upon a general exposition of our system of government. The inquiry here, the single inquiry to which my attention will be directed to-day, relates to the power of Congress to regulate foreign and interstate commerce and the extent of that authority.

The Federal Government being one of limited and enumerated powers, if a given power exists it must be found in the Constitution. The authority of Congress to regulate foreign and interstate commerce does not spring, as has been suggested by a distinguished Senator, from the general-welfare clause of the Constitution. That phrase is used but twice in the Constitution—once in the preamble and once in that section which confers upon Congress power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

While, in exercising this power to tax, commerce may be affected, it is manifest from the context that the substantive power in Congress to regulate foreign and interstate commerce can not be derived from this taxing provision, and consequently, if derivable at all from the general-welfare clause, it must be from that employed in the preamble.

It is equally obvious to me, Mr. President, from the nature and office of the preamble, that it does not confer such power or any power whatever. It was not intended to be and it is not the source of governmental authority of any character. It is a mere declaration of the purposes sought to be accomplished, and in the manner therein provided, by the establishment of the Constitution. The declaration of the preamble that—

> We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution—is not in itself a grant of power, but imports only that, by the establishment of the Constitution which follows, it is the purpose to promote the general welfare and attain the other high conceptions of a free people which are named. The general welfare was not to be promoted by the exercise of authority drawn from this reference to it in the preamble, but by the establishment of the Constitution, with the grants and prohibitions and reservations which it contains. It follows logically from what I have said that, in my judgment, the vital and potential authority in Congress in respect to this subject is to be found exclusively and necessarily in that provision of the Constitution which expressly confers upon Congress power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes."

It is a remarkable fact of history that the necessity for some such provision as this, the necessity for the regulation of foreign and interstate commerce by some general authority, was the chief concern of the statesmen who framed the Constitution. Indeed the convention of 1787 was not called to frame a Constitution, but solely to revise the Articles of Confederation, and especially to secure some adequate general regulation of this character of commerce by such revision.

At the commencement of the American Revolution the thirteen British colonies were sovereign political communities. They were protected by Great Britain against foreign danger and in a degree against internal discord, but with reference to their domestic concerns, they were, as between themselves, separate and independent. With respect to foreign and internal commerce they were independent of each other and in a large degree of the parent country. There was no general authority over either foreign or intercolonial commerce, and consequently irritating and discriminating regulations of such commerce often resulted.

Taxation of such commerce by some of the colonies through whose ports it passed was followed by severe and hurtful retaliation. New Jersey, placed between Philadelphia and New York, was likened to a cask tapped at both ends, and North Carolina, between Virginia and South Carolina, to a patient bleeding at both arms. Relief from these jealousies, conflicting regulations, and unjust commercial impositions was sought in the adoption of the Articles of Confederation. This form of government, however, afforded no adequate remedy, because, like the previous condition of the colonies, there was no exclusive and general authority over commerce, and especially commerce among the States. The complaints which were made under the colonial system, complaints of inharmonious regulations, of unjust tribute levied upon the products of neighboring States, and of contracted commercial intercourse under which trade was stifled and paralyzed, were revived and emphasized. Even Washington, mortified by the conduct of some of the States, declared that selfishness, commercial greed, and the indisposition to do justice were sources of national embarrassment. In the midst of these conditions the purpose to seek relief in a further change of government began to take shape and form.

The Constitution of the United States, which was the result of this movement—the greatest product of constructive statesmanship in the annals of mankind—was not only not foreshadowed by contemporaneous events, but the supreme and impelling motive of its formation was freedom of trade rather than freedom of man. It may be that the latter was thought to be already secure, and yet it is still remarkable that such an instrument as this Constitution, framed in the shadow of the Revolution, by States yet in the infancy of independence, which declared new guaranties of liberty and discovered untried philosophies of government, should have sprung primarily, not from the higher aspirations and nobler impulses which consecrated the struggle for independence, but from the demand for some general authority over commerce. That this is true is as indisputable as it is extraordinary.

To the Commonwealth of Virginia—God bless her—as in other cases of conspicuous and illustrious services to mankind, belongs the high honor of having initiated the movement which culminated in the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. Bear with me, Mr. President, a moment, while I put in a few sentences the history of that period.

In January, 1786, commissioners from that Commonwealth, consisting of Madison, Randolph, Tucker, Mason, and others, were appointed to confer with such commissioners as might be selected from other States—

> To take into consideration the trade of the United States; to examine the relative situations and trade of said States; to consider how far a uniform system in their commercial regulations may be necessary to their common interest and their permanent harmony, and to report to the several States such an act relative to this great object as, when unanimously ratified by them, will enable the United States in Congress assembled effectually to provide for the same.

Commissioners from only five States, pursuant to this call, met at Annapolis in September, 1786, and in consequence of this partial representation of the States no action was taken, except to adopt general resolutions and to recommend that a convention convene at Philadelphia in May, 1787.

When this report was submitted to Congress that body resolved that a convention should be held at Philadelphia, but "for the sole and express purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation." The result of the deliberations of that great convention, called to revise the Articles of Confederation, and not to form a constitution, is known of all thinking men, and further consideration is unnecessary here. Nor does the occasion invite an extended examination of the proceedings of the convention which resulted in the adoption of the commerce clause of the Constitution, which is the subject of this debate. It is sufficient to declare, Mr. President, as the truth of history, that the imperative necessity to provide a general authority for the regulation of foreign and interstate commerce aroused the country; that this was the dominating motive for calling the convention; that, although the convention was composed of men of different political schools, and although many plans of a constitution were submitted, all of them contemplated conferring this power upon the Federal Government; and that the grant of the power to Congress to regulate foreign and interstate commerce is exclusive and complete. Referring to foreign and interstate commerce and expressing the undoubted sense of the convention, Madison, who more than any other man was the author of the Constitution, declared he was "more and more convinced that the regulation of commerce was in its nature indivisible and ought to be wholly under one authority."

When, therefore, Mr. President, the subject of proposed legislation is commerce and, moreover, is commerce with foreign nations or among the several States, the authority to regulate it is exclusively and completely in Congress. The converse of the proposition is true. If the subject of proposed legislation is not commerce, or is a mere aid, auxiliary, or incident to such commerce, or if it be in fact commerce, yet commerce of a domestic or intrastate character, the authority to regulate it is exclusively and completely in the States.

The authority of the States continues, likewise, when the legislation does not amount to regulation, but touches foreign and interstate commerce only incidentally and remotely, and also when the subject of legislation pertains to the general police powers which are reserved to the States.

The power delegated to Congress, which we are considering, Mr. President, is to regulate foreign and interstate commerce. The bill under consideration, so far as need be stated now, presupposing that Congress itself may fix rates to be charged by carriers of foreign and interstate traffic, provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission, when a rate is found by it, upon complaint and hearing, to be unjust and unreasonable, shall fix in lieu thereof a just and reasonable rate.

At the threshold of an inquiry into the authority of Congress to enact such a statute several matters of importance may be assumed as being thoroughly established. Since the great case of Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheaton) there has been no question that commerce, the subject of this provision of the Constitution, embraces both traffic and commercial intercourse with foreign nations and among the States. It is equally accepted law that this commerce includes foreign and interstate navigation and transportation, by whatever motive power carried on, and that the authority to regulate such commerce necessarily comprehends authority to prescribe and establish the rules by which it is governed, managed, and conducted. Obviously, therefore, as foreign or interstate transportation is foreign or interstate commerce, the question here is whether the power in Congress to regulate such commerce includes the power to fix rates to be charged for such transportation, and if so, whether this power, to the extent proposed in this bill, may be delegated to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

It should be borne in mind that the authority of Congress to regulate commerce is limited to foreign and interstate commerce—to traffic, commercial intercourse, navigation, and transportation between the States and foreign nations and between the States themselves.

Prior to the adoption of the Constitution the regulation of such commerce was under the control of the respective States.

The commercial intercourse with foreign nations and between the States which existed at that time was not carried on as matter of right, but by comity or authority of the States.

Each State being sovereign, and there being no general authority over the subject, each State might prohibit such commercial intercourse altogether, or permit it upon terms which it might impose. By the adoption of the Constitution the regulation of such commerce was taken from the States and conferred upon Congress, and the whole power which the States possessed in this respect was thereby delegated to the Federal Government, under the limitations and restrictions of the Constitution. Commercial intercourse with foregin nations and among the several States continued after the adoption of the Constitution, and whether conducted by individuals, by State corporations, or by Federal corporations it is subject to the regulation of Congress.

What, then, is this power to regulate commerce which is vested in Congress, and does it include the power to fix rates of transportation? Whether authority to regulate embraces authority to engage in such commerce; whether the United States, with limited, not general sovereignty, may construct and operate railroads, it is unnecessary to determine, because each of these inquiries may be denied, and yet, under the power to regulate commerce, Congress may fix the rates of transportation.

To regulate, Mr. President, is to arrange, adjust, dispose, methodize, direct, order, rule, or govern. On principle, and as an original question, the power to regulate commerce includes the power to fix rates of transportation, because transportation is commerce; and to fix the rates is to that extent and necessarily to prescribe the rule by which it is governed.

Transportation for hire, which is the only kind sought to be regulated, from the very nature of the subject can not be carried on without establishing the amount of the wage or remuneration to be paid, and to fix this wage or remuneration is but to prescribe pro tanto the rule which is absolutely necessary for its conduct and its government.

Mr. President, the proposition approaches if it does not reach the self-evident and the axiomatic. Congress may fix and establish this wage or rate in general terms, as that it shall be reasonable; or a specific or maximum rate may be established, because either is within the broad and comprehensive power to regulate and govern. Not only as a question of first impression, but on the highest judicial authority, the power to regulate commerce includes the establishment of rates. From time immemorial the government of turnpikes, bridges, and ferries, under individual or corporate ownership, has been held to carry with it authority to fix tolls and charges, and as the rate of passage over these is a part of the entire cost of transportation, the principle involved in each is undeniably the same.

But, Mr. President, there is far more pertinent authority. Chief Justice Marshall, in Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheaton, 196), declared:

> It is the power to regulate; that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution.

The same principle was recently declared in Buttfield v. Stranahan (192 U. S., 470, 492), and in Northern Securities Company v. United States (193 U. S., 197, 341, 367). In Gloucester Ferry Company v. Pennsylvania (114 U. S., 203), the court said:

> The power to regulate commerce is the power to prescribe the rule by which it shall be governed—that is, the conditions upon which it shall be conducted.

If the power to regulate is complete in itself and may be exercised by Congress to its utmost extent, subject only to the limitations prescribed in the Constitution—if the power to regulate includes the conditions upon which transportation may be conducted—then unquestionably the power to regulate embraces the power to fix rates of transportation, because this is not only within the unlimited power described, but to establish rates of transportation, whether done in general terms, as that they shall be reasonable, or in specific terms, naming maximum or actual rates, is to prescribe the conditions upon which it may be conducted.

The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Philadelphia Steamship Company v. Pennsylvania (122 U. S., 338), used this language:

> The application of this reasoning to the case in hand is obvious. Of what use would it be to the shipowner, in carrying on interstate and foreign commerce, to have the right of transporting persons and goods free from State interference if he had not the equal right to charge for such transportation without such interference? The very object of his engaging in transportation is to receive pay for it. If the regulation of the transportation belongs to the power of Congress to regulate commerce, the regulation of fares and freights receivable for such transportation must equally belong to that power.

Construing the municipal power to regulate the streets of a city, the same court said, in St. Louis v. Western Union Telegraph Co. (149 U. S., 465, 469):

The word "regulate" is one of broad import. It is the word used in the Federal Constitution to define the power of Congress over foreign and interstate commerce, and he who reads the many opinions of this court will perceive how broad and comprehensive it has been held to be. If the city gives a right to the use of the streets or public grounds, as it did by ordinance, it simply regulates the use when it prescribes the terms and conditions upon which they shall be used. If it should see fit to construct an extensive boulevard in the city and then limit the use to vehicles of a certain kind or exact a toll from all who use it, would that be other than a regulation of the use?

I understood the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] the other day to say that no case could be found where the Supreme Court had decided that Congress could fix rates. In the case of Interstate Commerce Commission v. R. R. Co. (167 U. S., 494), the same court said:

There were three obvious and dissimilar courses open for consideration. Congress might itself prescribe the rates; or it might commit to some subordinate tribunal this duty; or it might leave with the companies the right to fix rates, subject to regulations and restrictions, as well as to that rule which is as old as the existence of common carriers, to wit, that rates must be reasonable.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. What I said in the remarks referred to by the Senator from Texas was this: That there were some expressions, particularly in the case from which the Senator is now reading, which indicated that the Supreme Court entertained that view, but that none of these expressions were made in a case where that question was before the court and where they were passing on that question. That I repeat.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the Senator's explanation is in accordance with what I understood and in accordance with what I attempted to say. In the case to which I called attention a moment ago, in 122 United States, in an opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Brewer, the court, in a case where it was necessary to say so declared that the power to regulate rates of freight and passengers belonged to the power to regulate commerce. In the case in 167 United States, to which the Senator has just referred, the court had for consideration the whole question involved in the regulation of commerce, and it distinctly declared that there were three methods open; that Congress itself might prescribe the rates; that it might delegate the power to a subordinate tribunal, or that it might leave the matter to the railroad companies themselves.

But proceeding, Mr. President, with this matter of authorities. In the case of Ames v. Union Pacific Railway Company (64 Fed. Rep., 165, 178) Mr. Justice Brewer, on the circuit, said:

But within the scope of the word "regulation," as commonly used, is embraced the idea of fixing the compensation which the owners of railroad property shall receive for the use thereof.

In the dissenting opinion in Northern Securities Company v. United States (193 U. S., 368) Mr. Justice White said:

The plenary authority of Congress over interstate commerce, its right to regulate it to the fullest extent, to fix the rates to be charged for the movement of interstate commerce, to legislate concerning the ways and vehicles actually engaged in such traffic, and to exert any and every other power over such commerce which flows from the authority conferred by the Constitution is thus conceded.

Congress has so construed this provision of the Constitution and acted upon it. By section 18 of the act approved July 1, 1862, which is the charter of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, it is provided that in the event the net earnings—

After deducting all expenditures, including repairs and the furnishing, running, and management of said road shall exceed 10 per cent upon its cost, exclusive of the 5 per cent to be paid to the United States, Congress may reduce the rates of fare thereon, if unreasonable, and may fix and establish the same by law.

This is the precise authority which I am seeking to establish—the authority of Congress to fix rates by law when those fixed by the companies are found to be unreasonable. Like power in Congress is asserted in the act approved March 3, 1871, which is the charter of the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, where it is provided in section 15 that—

The rates charged for carrying passengers and freight, per mile, shall not exceed the prices which may be fixed by Congress for carrying passengers and freight on the Union Pacific and Central Pacific railroads.

Mr. FORAKER. I called attention to these acts of Congress in the remarks I made on the occasion referred to by the Senator, but differentiated those cases from the others we had been discussing, and the difference is this: In that case the United States was exercising its proprietary right to grant it a franchise, and it had a right to attach any conditions it saw fit as the conditions of the taking of the right.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator ought also to have said that Congress in granting this franchise to the railroad company was doing so under its authority to regulate commerce. It was using it as a means, among others, to regulate commerce, and Congress can not assume authority to fix the rates of transportation over any railroad except it be under the authority to regulate commerce.

Mr. FORAKER. There are some expressions in some of the cases to the effect that Congress may have the right to build a railroad in the exercise of its power to regulate commerce; but I do not know of any case decided by the Supreme Court where that question was before it in which they have held that Congress was undertaking to exercise its power to regulate commerce when it granted charters for the construction of these railroads. In the acts and in the decisions they are referred to as having been authorized by the Government in the exercise of its power to establish post-roads, provide for the national defense, etc.

Mr. CULBERSON. Assuming, therefore, on principle, on judicial authority, and on Congressional precedents, that Congress itself may fix the rates of transportation of foreign and interstate commerce, the further question is whether it may, to the extent proposed in the bill, delegate this power to the Interstate Commerce Commission. It has often been decided by the highest State courts and by the Supreme Court of the United States—so often that citation of authorities on the subject is unnecessary—that State legislatures may fix rates directly, or delegate the power to do so, as to domestic commerce, to railroad commissions. These decisions are persuasive, but not conclusive of the question as presented here, because the authority of the States over domestic commerce is derived from their general sovereignty, while that of Congress rests upon the specific grant of power to regulate commerce, and also because in some of the States where the cases arose the legislatures were expressly authorized by the State constitution to create such commissions and invest them with such powers. This is particularly true of the celebrated Reagan case (154 U. S., 362), for by an amendment to the constitution of Texas, adopted for the purpose, the legislature, in regulating rates, was expressly authorized to "provide and establish all requisite means and agencies invested with such powers as may be deemed adequate and advisable."

Mr. KNOX. Before the Senator leaves the proposition that Congress has the power to establish rates of interstate transportation, I wish to ask him if he does not attach a great deal of importance to this fact: The courts have decided over and over again that the States may not regulate the charges upon interstate transportation, because it would interfere with the regulative power of Congress, and therefore must it not be within the regulative power of Congress?

Mr. CULBERSON. Undoubtedly; and I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania for suggesting it.

Returning to the proposition which I desire to submit to the Senate now—that is, that Congress may, to the extent proposed in this bill, delegate the rate-making power to the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Constitution declares that—

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States.

The power in Congress to regulate foreign and interstate commerce is necessarily a legislative power. This is not only the innate character of the power, but the Constitution declares it to be such by vesting it in Congress, which, besides being clothed with all Federal legislative powers, except in instances not pertinent here, as in making treaties, is without authority to exercise any other power.

As Congress may establish rates of transportation, under its authority to regulate commerce, the power to establish rates must be legislative, and as a distinctly Federal question it has been so expressly decided in Interstate Commerce Commission v. Railroad Company (167 U. S., 499).

To deny that the power to fix rates of transportation is legislative in character is to deny that Congress may exercise it, because Congress may not constitutionally exercise any other than legislative powers.

Mr. President, I concede as a general and essential principle of American constitutional law that Congress may not delegate its legislative powers, and consequently Congress may not delegate its legislative power to regulate commerce. While the power of Congress to fix rates of transportation is included in and derived from and incident to its broad legislative power to regulate commerce, it does not follow that, after making general provision for the regulation of commerce, it may not devolve on a board or commission the power to fix rates.

Mr. RAYNER. May I interrupt the Senator from Texas while he is upon this proposition?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. RAYNER. I should like to say to the Senator from Texas that, while I agree with him in the main point he is arguing, the case that has given me more trouble than any other is that of the Northern Securities Company against The United States, which is the latest decision we have upon the subject, and there the court intimates that the question is not closed. The Senator read from the dissenting opinion.

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes.

Mr. RAYNER. In the opinion of the majority of the court there is this statement:

> Will it be said that Congress can meet such emergencies by prescribing the rates by which interstate carriers shall be governed in the transportation of freight and passengers? If Congress has the power to fix such rates—and upon that question we express no opinion.

That looks very much like the court had never expressed an opinion on the subject that bound them in any way.

Mr. CULBERSON. I remember the language used by Mr. Justice Harlan in that case, and I have not been unmindful of it in what I have said. But under the previous decisions of the court, where the question was discussed thoroughly, it seems to me there is no resisting the conclusion that the court as a court has determined the question.

Early in our history Chief Justice Marshall, in Wayman v. Southard (10 Wheat., 46), said:

> The difference between the departments undoubtedly is that the legislature makes, the executive executes, and the judiciary construes the law, but the maker of the law may commit something to the discretion of the other departments, and the precise boundary of this power is a subject of delicate and difficult inquiry, into which a court will not enter unnecessarily.

By declaring that rates of transportation shall be just and reasonable Congress would prescribe the comprehensive rule by which it would be regulated, and while it possesses the naked power to fix the rates directly, it may rightfully vest in a board or commission authority to fix such rates.

That would merely give effect to the general purpose of the act to establish just and reasonable rates and would be a means used by Congress to exercise its power to regulate commerce. It would not add to or subtract from the law as such; it would not alter or amend it; it would not be new or additional legislation proper; it would only effectuate and enforce the general standard of rates fixed by the law. Under the circumstances it would be legislation only in a qualified sense, for the controlling legislation on the subject would be the law declaring that the rates should be just and reasonable.

The act of Congress approved March 2, 1897, to prevent the importation of impure and unwholesome tea is a type of such a law. It prohibited the importation of tea inferior in purity, quality, and fitness for consumption to the standards prepared by a board and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. The act was attacked on the ground that it delegated legislative power to the Secretary of the Treasury to fix the standard of purity of tea, but its validity was sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States in the recent case of Buttfield v. Stranaham (192 U. S., 470, 496), where it is said:

> Congress legislated on the subject as far as was reasonably practicable, and from the necessity of the case was compelled to leave to executive officials the duty of bringing about the result pointed out by the statute. To deny the power of Congress to delegate such a duty would, in effect, amount to but declaring that the plenary power vested in Congress to regulate foreign commerce could not be efficaciously exerted.

The sound rule of interpretation announced in this case is applicable to the question under consideration. The proposed act provides the general rule that rates shall be just and reasonable. Congress has the power to go further and fix the rates which should conform to this rule, but it would be inconvenient, if not impracticable to do so. It may therefore leave it to the railroad companies to fix the rates, as it has heretofore done, sometimes by implication and sometimes expressly, or it may authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix the rates. The former method has never been questioned, and on principle the latter is equally beyond controversy, because the power is the same, and if it may be delegated in one case it may be also delegated in the other. Neither would involve an unlawful delegation of legislative power. By providing that rates shall be just and reasonable Congress will legislate as far as is reasonably practicable, and by giving authority to the Commission, which is constantly in session, composed of impartial and learned members, and provided with appropriate machinery for exhaustive inquiry and prompt action, is but to devolve upon the Commission the "duty of bringing about the result pointed out by the statute," which is to fix just and reasonable rates.

The legislation proposed here is freer from constitutional objections than the act regulating the importation of tea. There the power to fix the general standard of tea, as well as its enforcement, was devolved upon the Secretary of the Treasury, while here Congress will fix the general standard of rates, leaving only to the Commission authority to effectuate the general purpose.

Mr. President, while the grant of legislative powers to Congress carries with it authority to pass all necessary laws, yet the Constitution expressly and significantly, as I think, gives discretion to Congress as to laws it may pass to execute its powers. After granting all Federal legislative powers to Congress, the Constitution enumerates those powers, and then declares that Congress shall have the additional power—

> To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any Department or officer thereof.

This is not authority to make provision for the enforcement of laws which have been passed, but more than that. It is authority to make laws for "carrying into execution the foregoing powers," one of which is to regulate foreign and interstate commerce, and the proposed law is necessary and proper to execute that power. This provision of the Federal Constitution, although of a more general character, is akin to that clause of the constitution of Texas which authorizes the legislature, in executing its power to regulate rates, to "provide and establish all requisite means and agencies, invested with such powers as may be deemed adequate and advisable," and under which the railroad commission of that State was organized and invested with this legislative power.

Nor can it be justly said, Mr. President, as has been contended by a distinguished former Secretary of State, that the standard of "reasonable" is too broad and general, wanting in that specific character which should mark a rule of civil conduct which can be executed by a board or a commission. The standard of reasonable in its application to common carriers was fixed by the common law, and its meaning is as clear as that of any other general principle of that great system of our ancestors. While the common law is not of itself in force in the United States, yet this standard of the common law by which the charge of carriers is measured has been frequently adopted in the statutes of the United States and its signification and limitations have been so repeatedly declared judicially that it may be regarded as a part of American law. As a consequence, because its meaning and boundaries have been crystallized in our jurisprudence, the attempt to fix a different standard, as is done in some of the bills on this subject—as that the rate shall be lawful, fairly remunerative, and the like—not only tends to confusion, but to the destruction of a standard which has been thoroughly defined and which has marked the industrial progress of the country.

If, Mr. President, the power to establish rates of transportation of foreign and interstate commerce is comprised in the general power to regulate commerce; if this power to fix rates may be exercised directly by Congress, or, to the limited extent proposed, may be devolved upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, when and upon what grounds may the courts of the United States interfere in the interest of the carrier to prevent the enforcement of rates so established? This question as it relates to State regulation of rates has been frequently decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, and while the decisions are not decisive of the question as it arises here, the reasoning is applicable and instructive.

The grounds upon which the Federal courts will arrest the operation of rates fixed by legislatures or State commissions have been thus stated in the leading cases:

> It is not to be inferred that this power of limitation or regulation is itself without limit. This power to regulate is not a power to destroy and limitation is not the equivalent of confiscation. Under pretense of regulating fares and freights the State can not require a railroad corporation to carry persons or property without reward; neither can it do that which in law amounts to a taking of private property for public use without just compensation or without due process of law. (Railroad Commission cases, 116 U. S., 307, 311.)

Quoting the language above from the Railroad Commission cases, and holding that the rates fixed by the legislature were not unreasonable, the Supreme Court said:

> Still less does it appear that there has been any such confiscation as amounts to a taking of property without due process of law. (Dow v. Beidelman, 125 U. S., 680.)
> If the company is deprived of the power of charging reasonable rates for the use of its property and such deprivation takes place in the absence of an investigation by judicial machinery, it is deprived of the lawful use of its property, and thus, in substance and effect, of the property itself, without due process of law and in violation of the Constitution of the United States; and in so far as it is thus deprived, while other persons are permitted to receive reasonable profits upon their invested capital, the company is deprived of the equal protection of the laws. (Railroad Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. S., 418, 458.)

The legislature has power to fix rates and the extent of judicial interference is protection against unreasonable rates. (Railroad Commission cases, 116 U. S., 307; Railroad Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. S., 418.)

Surely before the courts are called upon to adjudge an act of the legislature fixing the maximum passenger rates for railroad companies to be unconstitutional, on the ground that its enforcement would prevent the stockholders from receiving any dividends on their investments, or the bondholders any interest on their loans, they should be fully advised as to what is done with the receipts and earnings of the company. (Railroad Co. v. Wellman, 143 U. S., 339, 344, 345.)

We are of opinion that the act of the legislature of New York is not contrary to the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and does not deprive the citizen of his property without due process of law; that the act, in fixing the maximum charges which it specifies, is not unconstitutional, nor is it so in limiting the charge for shoveling to the actual cost thereof.

In the cases before us the records do not show that the charges fixed by the statute are unreasonable or that property has been taken without due process of law or that there has been any denial of the equal protection of the laws, even if under any circumstances we could determine that the maximum rate fixed by the legislature was unreasonable. (Budd v. New York, 143 U. S., 517, 544, 548.)

In the Reagan case the bill of complaint charged that the rates were unreasonable and confiscatory, and that their enforcement would amount to a deprivation of property without due process of law, and without adequate compensation, in violation of the State and Federal constitutions. "Still there can be no doubt of their power and duty (the courts) to inquire whether a body of rates prescribed by a legislature or a commission is unjust and unreasonable and such as to work a practical destruction to rights of property, and if found so to be, to restrain its operation."

These cases all support the proposition that while it is not the province of the courts to enter upon the merely administrative duty of framing a tariff of rates for carriage, it is within the scope of judicial power and a part of judicial duty to restrain anything which, in the form of a regulation of rates, operates to deny to the owners of property invested in the business of transportation that equal protection which is the constitutional right of all owners of other property. * * * The equal protection of the laws which, by the fourteenth amendment, no State can deny to the individual, forbids legislation, in whatever form it may be enacted, by which the property of one individual is, without compensation, wrested from him for the benefit of another or of the public. (Reagan v. Loan and Trust Co., 154 U. S., 362, 397, 399.)

There is a remedy in the courts for relief against legislation establishing a tariff of rates which is so unreasonable as to practically destroy the value of property of companies engaged in the carrying business, and that especially may the courts of the United States treat such a question as a judicial one, and hold such acts of legislation to be in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, as depriving the companies of their property without due process of law, and as depriving them of the equal protection of the laws. (Railroad Co. v. Gill, 156 U. S., 649, 657.)

These principles must be regarded as settled:

1. A railroad corporation is a person within the meaning of the fourteenth amendment declaring that no State shall deprive any person of property without due process of law nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

2. A State enactment, or regulations made under the authority of a State enactment, establishing rates for the transportation of persons or property by railroad that will not admit of the carrier earning such compensation as under all the circumstances is just to it and to the public would deprive such carrier of its property without due process of law and deny to it the equal protection of the laws, and would therefore be repugnant to the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

If the rates are fixed at an insufficient amount within the meaning of that term (just compensation) as given by the courts, the law would be invalid as amounting to the taking of the property of the company without due process of law. (Railroad Co. v. Smith, 173 U. S., 687.)

When we recall that, as estimated, over ten thousand millions of dollars are invested in railroad property, the proposition that such a vast amount of property is beyond the protecting clauses of the Constitution; that the owners may be deprived of it by the arbitrary enactment of any legislature, State, or nation, without any right of appeal to the courts, is one which can not for a moment be tolerated. (Railroad Co. v. Tompkins, 176 U. S., 172.)

It is sufficient, however, for the purpose of this case to say that the action of the Commission in fixing the rate complained of as to this particular class of freight has not been shown to be so unjust or unreasonable as to amount to a taking of property without due process of law. (Railroad Co. v. Minnesota, 186 U. S., 268, 269.)

Referring with commendation to the principles announced in the Reagan case, Mr. Justice Brewer, on the circuit, in Ames v. Railroad Company (64 Fed. Rep., 173), said:

"But the grave question still remains, are the rates prescribed in this act, as the maximum over which the railroad companies may not go, unreasonable, and so unreasonable as to justify the courts in staying their operation?"

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. The only question that worries me about the case of Smyth v. Ames (169 U. S.) is this: I concede that Congress can not empower the Interstate Commerce Commission to make a rate that is not compensatory for the services performed. I should like to ask the Senator this question: If we empower the Interstate Commerce Commission to make a rate, and declare that that rate must be reasonable and just and compensatory, and the carrier should come to the conclusion that the Commission had exceeded the authority of Congress, and had put in operation a rate that was not reasonable and just, can we deprive the carrier of the right of going into a court of equity and enjoining the enforcement of that rate until there is a final hearing? In other words, can we provide that the rates fixed by the Commission shall be effective until there is a final hearing under the Constitution?

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, in the course of what I have intended to say I will reach that suggestion of the Senator from Georgia presently, and I hope I will answer him satisfactorily.

Mr. President, from these extracts from the opinions in the leading Federal authorities it is plain that in cases arising under State regulation of rates the grounds of judicial interference have been wholly constitutional. The language of the opinions varies, it is true, but the decisions unquestionably rest upon the proposition that when rates are so unreasonable as to justify judicial interposition it is because, in violation of the fourteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution, they amount to a deprivation of property without due process of law or to a denial of the equal protection of the laws.

There runs through these decisions also the principle that the courts will not interfere with the large discretion in legislatures and commissions in fixing rates, will not interpose their judgment in matters of policy and business affecting rates, and that to justify judicial interference the rates must not only be unreasonable, but so unreasonable as to amount to confiscation.

This is because rate making is a legislative and not a judicial function.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I should like to ask the Senator right there if he does not understand that the Supreme Court has practically established the proposition that a rate which does not furnish a revenue that will bear expenses of operation and also supply a fair remuneration or return on the investment is confiscatory?

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not so understand the decisions.

Mr. FULTON. What does the Senator understand that the Supreme Court would consider a rate that would be confiscatory?

Mr. CULBERSON. The latest expression upon that question, as the Senator is aware, is in the case of Smyth v. Ames, in 169 U. S.

Mr. FULTON. The Nebraska case?

Mr. CULBERSON. The Nebraska case, in which the court for several pages makes general observations with reference to the elements of a reasonable rate. Taking it all together it amounts to saying that each case must stand on its own footing, and it said, besides, that there are some cases in which rates would be intolerable if they permitted a return on the actual cost or the actual investment in the railroad property.

But, Mr. President, the proposition that I was discussing——

Mr. FULTON. Will the Senator allow me right there?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I happen to have here a quotation from the Nebraska case. It says:

> What the company is entitled to ask is a fair return upon the value of that which it employs for the public convenience.

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly, that is the general basis; but the Senator will observe that there are qualifications of that in the opinion.

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator will allow me, if the company is entitled to a fair return on that which it employs for the public convenience, then anything which would deprive it of that fair return would, in the judgment of the court, be confiscatory, or, at least, it would be that entrenchment upon the rights of the company which would justify the court in interfering, would it not?

Mr. CULBERSON. In that very case Mr. Justice Harlan said, in delivering the opinion, if the rate is such as not to permit a fair return, or such compensation as the Constitution secures to the company, it would be confiscatory, and its enforcement might be arrested by the Federal court.

I was observing, Mr. President, when interrupted, that the force of these decisions rests upon the proposition that rate-making is a legislative not a judicial function; that rates are based upon considerations so multitudinous, conflicting, and varying as to afford no definite legal rules for their ascertainment which the courts may apply, and that it is contrary to the genius of our Government that the judiciary shall control legislative functions so long as they are exercised within constitutional limitations. If a statute, State or Federal, authorized the courts to review generally or at any stage where discretion may be exercised the fixing of rates by the legislative branch of the Government or by a commission, it would be an unwarranted attempt to confer legislative power on the courts.

When rates are fixed by the legislature or a commission acting under a statute to fix just and reasonable rates, the legislative act of regulation of commerce by the establishment of rates is complete, and the only inquiry which the courts may then institute is whether these rates have been established without passing the bounds of constitutional authority.

Primarily and generally it may be said that when a power, whether exercised by the legislature or a commission, is legislative in character, the courts, from the very nature of the judicial attribute and our constitutional system, may not ordinarily interfere with its exercise. It is only when the action of the legislature or the commission is arbitrary, despotic, and violative of the organic law, passing the limits of legislative authority, that the courts may interfere to restrain or limit their action.

Mr. President, both the constitutional questions and the questions of business and policy, which enter into rate making, were clearly presented by Mr. Victor Morawetz, general counsel of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad Company in his statement before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce in April, 1905. It has all the force of a declaration against interest and is entitled to your serious consideration. Let me read it:

2. My second point, which is well settled, is that Congress has no constitutional power to reduce the charges of a carrier so far as to deprive the carrier of a reasonable return upon his property. Under the fifth amendment to the Constitution any act of Congress or any order of a commission established by Congress limiting or fixing the rates of a railway company would be unconstitutional if the enforcement of that act of Congress or order of a commission would in effect deprive the carrier of a reasonable return upon the property used for the purpose of furnishing the service to the public.

3. The third point which I wish to make is this: There is a wide range between a rate that is unreasonably high, and therefore illegal as against the shipper, and a rate that is so low as to be confiscatory as against the carrier. For example: Assuming that a railway company may charge 40 cents a hundred pounds for carrying a given article between two points without making the rate unreasonably high, and therefore illegal, it is quite possible that this rate might be reduced by legislative action to, say, 30 cents a hundred pounds without violating any constitutional right of the carrier. In this case the maximum rate which would be reasonable and which could be imposed by the carrier upon the shipper would be 40 cents a hundred pounds, and the minimum rate which could be imposed by the legislature on the railway company would be 30 cents a hundred pounds. The adjustment of the rate between these two extremes would depend upon considerations of business policy and would not be governed by the application of any legal principles or definite rules. The charges of carriers, like the charges in any other business, are fixed largely by considerations of business policy, such as the desirability of encouraging certain industries or of developing incidentally other sources of traffic. Many other elements must be considered besides the cost of doing the business, such as competition by land and water, the volume of the business, the character of the business, the length of the haul, the rates which can be paid in competition with producers of similar articles at other places, the existence of return loads, etc. It is rarely, if ever, true that there is but one just and reasonable rate for the transportation of a given article between two points. In nearly every instance there is a wide range within which any rate would be just and reasonable, and it is wholly a question of business policy at what point the rate shall be fixed within that range.

Mr. President, the prohibitions of the fourteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution which were applied in the State cases, to which I have called attention, have no direct application to the question as presented here. The limitations upon the power of Congress or a commission created by it are those of the fifth amendment to the Federal Constitution, to the effect that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

The first of these provisions, that relating to the deprivation of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, is precisely the same as that on the same subject in the fourteenth amendment, the one prohibitive of Federal action and the other prohibitive of State action, and consequently the logic of the cases to which I have referred applies to the Federal question here.

Undoubtedly under these decisions similar rates fixed by Congress or a Federal commission would be held violative of this provision of the fifth amendment, and undoubtedly also, under these State cases, it would be held that the courts would not concern themselves with the questions of business and policy involved in rate making, and that in order to justify interference the rates must not only be unreasonable, but so unreasonable as to be equivalent to confiscation.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am very much interested in the discussion of this legal question which the Senator is so ably presenting. I should like to know whether, in his judgment, the fifth amendment would apply to what might be termed the reasonable profits which a person would be entitled to make upon his business, or whether it would have any application except where the question of confiscation attached, which would be at the line between the actual cost and where the profits began? That is a question which seems to me to be very important to consider, because it goes to the question of the jurisdiction of the court to review. It is based upon that principle when reduced down. I should be very glad, indeed, if it would not interrupt the line of the Senator's argument, if he would give us the benefit of his suggestion as to where the fifth amendment attaches—to be explicit, whether it attaches until the principle of confiscation commences or whether it involves the question of a reasonable profit.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I was attempting to present that particular question, and I had said that in my judgment, under the decisions in the State cases to which I have invited attention, the same principles would apply; and that with similar rates fixed by Congress or the Interstate Commerce Commission they would be declared in violation of that provision of the fifth amendment against the deprivation of property without due process of law, as those cases have elucidated that question.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CULBERSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. Is not the criterion of these cases found in the last paragraph of the amendment—"Nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation?" Is not that always the criterion as to whether it is just compensation, and is not that the counterpart and equivalent of the phrase "a reasonable rate?"

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I was about to reach that clause of the fifth amendment when interrupted by the Senator from Minnesota. I was about to say that when rates are confiscatory and wanting in just compensation, within the meaning of these decisions, it would probably be held to be a taking of private property for public use without just compensation, in violation of this clause of the fifth amendment, although in strictness the regulation of the use of property would not be a taking, and although such a construction might extend this provision beyond the conception of its framers.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. Then do I understand the Senator from Texas to concede that Congress can not pass a law which will temporarily deprive the carriers of the right to go into the courts and test the question as to whether or not the rate is confiscatory?

Mr. CULBERSON. I am coming to that, if the Senator will allow me. Mr. President, as the grounds of judicial interposition are constitutional, there is, in my judgment, no necessity for embodying the right of judicial review in this bill, although I have done so. This right of judicial review exists by virtue of the Constitution, and a statute may not add to or subtract from it. Still, if it is incorporated in the bill, confining it to the constitutional provision upon which it properly rests, and not extending it to matters of business and policy respecting rates with which the courts will not concern themselves, because it is no part of the judicial function, it will but recognize the constitutional right which already exists, and though entirely useless will not be objectionable.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. When the Congress, as is proposed in the bill under consideration, provides that the rate shall be just and reasonable and fairly remunerative, is not that a legislative requirement that it would be proper to have the courts protect in the execution of this law, if we saw fit to give that authority?

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, that is the very matter which I am endeavoring to guard against, the proposition to change the standard by which rates are measured, the proposition to introduce a new standard. Do not misunderstand me. Without reflecting upon anyone and without intention to reflect upon anyone, the proposition to introduce a new standard by which rates will be measured and determined is to legislate in favor of the railroad companies and give them an opportunity to have a different and more favorable standard established than that which is now in existence.

Mr. FORAKER. I only want to exactly understand the Senator in that connection. If I do understand him, he is opposed to the employment of the language "fairly remunerative."

Mr. CULBERSON. I have said so.

Mr. FORAKER. I wanted to understand perfectly the ground on which it establishes a new standard not heretofore known to the law. It is the Senator's idea that "justly compensatory," if that is a correct expression, would conform to the standard that has heretofore been employed?

Mr. CULBERSON. My bill uses the words "just and reasonable," which have been repeatedly construed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and I think that standard should be adhered to.

Mr. FORAKER. I simply wanted to understand the Senator, and I would have understood him, no doubt, if I had been following him a little bit more closely, but my attention was distracted for a moment. I know that the Senator in his bill employs the language "just and reasonable," but I have seen it stated in the newspapers that it will be contended that the words "fairly remunerative" should be stricken out of this bill and the words "justly compensatory" inserted in lieu thereof. I only wanted to understand exactly where the Senator stood with respect to that; and I wanted to follow it with a question as to whether he does not think that that would be establishing a new standard also?

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I have already said that, in my judgment, the attempt to fix a new standard, as that the rate shall be fairly remunerative, would tend to confusion and to the destruction of the standard which has been fixed, the meaning of which is thoroughly established by the decisions and understood by the public.

Now, I will stop a moment and go out of my line to say a word on the pending bill, although I did not intend to discuss the particular features of the bill to-day, which is in the keeping and under the guidance of the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. That bill in respect to the question just presented by the Senator from Ohio amounts to this: The railroad company is required by the bill to fix just and reasonable rates; when the Commission is authorized to hear complaints the Commission is required to fix what, in its judgment, is a just and reasonable and a fairly remunerative rate, which is a far more liberal standard, as I think, or at least a different standard, from that which the railroad company is authorized and required to establish and the meaning of which has been crystallized in the law.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask just one question?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator see any distinction or contend for one between the just compensation of the fifth amendment as applied to this subject-matter and the reasonable compensation of the common law?

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I have already stated that when this question reaches the Supreme Court it will probably apply—as, in fact, it has applied the same language in State constitutions—"just compensation" to the words "just and reasonable," which come down to us from the common law, and that the courts would probably hold a rate which would not give the return that the decisions say they ought to give would be lacking in just compensation within the meaning of the fifth amendment, and therefore would be unconstitutional.

Mr. SPOONER. Then the Senator is not contending for different degrees of confiscation, of course?

Mr. CULBERSON. Surely not. I am surprised that the Senator should ask the question.

Mr. SPOONER. I did ask it.

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes; that is evident.

But, Mr. President, when interrupted I was speaking with reference to what ought to go into this bill with respect to the right of judicial review. I have said that, in my opinion, it is unnecessary to incorporate such a provision, but that it would be harmless if incorporated. I desire to say now that if the bill undertakes affirmatively to limit or deny the constitutional right of review, that provision of the bill would be void, although the other part of the act might stand and be effective.

Mr. President, by the Constitution the judicial power of the United States is vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as Congress may establish; and the judicial power of the United States extends, among others, to all cases in law and equity arising under the Constitution. It is within the power of Congress to abolish all courts inferior to the Supreme Court, or to take from them jurisdiction of cases arising under the Constitution. But so long as they have jurisdiction of such cases, as now, the exercise of the judicial power to determine, in a proper case, whether rates have been established in violation of the Constitution can not, I think, be limited, abridged, or denied by statute. If the courts are authorized, as is conceded, to enjoin the operation of confiscatory rates by final decree to deny them authority to do so previous to this, although jurisdiction has attached, would in effect limit the exercise of the judicial power which springs from the Constitution. Jurisdiction is conferred in this instance by statute; but the judicial power arises primarily from the Constitution. Under the Constitution, Mr. President, persons may no more be deprived temporarily of their property without due process of law, or for public use without just compensation, than they may be deprived of it permanently. A remedy, as proposed in this bill, against the improvident use of restraining orders is to authorize immediate appeals from such orders directly to the Supreme Court of the United States, where it is not to be doubted these questions will receive that consideration which their importance and gravity demand, and will be determined in accordance with those great principles of justice which lie at the foundation of judicial power.

Mr. FORAKER. If I do not interrupt the Senator——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator is making a very able and a very interesting argument, and I only want to get the Senator's views. I do not interrupt him for any other purpose. I understand the Senator to have stated that he recognizes that there is a difference between confiscatory rates and what are just and reasonable rates; and I understand him to be contending now that the court, without any statutory enactment, has the power to intervene at the suit of an aggrieved party to protect from confiscatory rates; but do I understand the Senator to contend that that power extends to an inquiry as to whether or not a given rate is a just and reasonable rate, or does it stop with the question whether or not it is confiscatory?

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the Senator misunderstands me in a degree. The Supreme Court has said, in the different opinions, as I undertsand them, that the courts have no authority to interfere with the rates so far as the standard of just and reasonable is concerned, except when they are so unreasonable as to justify the charge or claim that they are equivalent to confiscation.

Mr. FORAKER. Then the reverse of that proposition, as I understand the Senator, is that they have no power at all as to just and reasonable rates, but their sole inquiry is whether or not the rates are confiscatory?

Mr. CULBERSON. That is my opinion of the law.

Mr. FORAKER. Does the Senator not concede that Congress, requiring just and reasonable rates, as contradistinguished from all other kinds of rates to be fixed, may at the same time authorize the court to inquire as to whether or not the rates in a given case are just and reasonable and in accordance with the requirements of the statute?

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not think so at all, Mr. President, because there is a latitude in the fixing of just and reasonable rates, between rates which, popularly speaking, for instance, would be extortionate as to the shipper and those which would be confiscatory as to the carrier. Within those limitations, in my judgment, Congress has no power to authorize the courts to go, because it involves the execution of a legislative power rather than a judicial power.

Mr. President, not only may Congress fix the rates of transportation, or, to the extent involved in this bill, delegate that power to the Interstate Commerce Commission, but, in my judgmen, it is expedient and wise to do so. It has been said that the abuses in the management and operation of railroads, which are admitted to have existed, have passed away, and that consequently there is no necessity for the passage of such a law as this.

There is abundant evidence, some of it adduced before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce during the past year, that this assumption is wholly unfounded. Rebates continue to be paid in some degree; and, although the bill under consideration, in direct legislation, only adds to the punishment for such offenses, yet this feature, as well as the entire act, will exert a wholesome and restraining influence. Discrimination against commodities and places is perhaps as rife as at any other period during our history.

Much has been said in the consideration of this subject here and elsewhere respecting the general downward trend of railroad rates. For the greater portion of the last thirty years that great economic fact has been evident; but for the last few years, according to the Interstate Commerce Commission, rates have been on an ascending scale.

The grain rate has advanced. In five years the rate on yellow-pine lumber has advanced 20 per cent. During recent years the rate on live stock from Texas to Wyoming and Montana has advanced from $55 to $100 per carload. The southwestern systems of railroads, at one bound and by concerted action, advanced the rates on all classes of goods and commodities from 7 to 20 per cent. By reclassification of freights throughout the United States, made between 1900 and 1903, under which commodities were transferred to classes bearing higher rates, the average increase was 21 per cent; and the income for 1903, due largely to this advance in rates, exceeded the income for 1899 by $155,000,000. The railroads of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1903, earned a net income of 5.1 per cent on a total stock and bond valuation of $63,000 a mile, which was at least $23,000 a mile in excess of the fair value of the property, and therefore for purposes of revenue from rates was excessive and fictitious. But aside from these specifications, aside from rebates and discriminations, aside from increased and burdensome rates, aside from the tribute levied upon the commerce of the country to support speculative and fictitious issues of stock and bonds, this power should be conferred upon the Commission as a guard against possible injustice to the public.

Railroads are public highways, and the companies exercise functions of sovereignty. They possess the power of eminent domain and the authority to take tolls. Their franchises, which were granted subject to the rights of the people, enter into the value of railway property, which is clothed with a public interest and charged with a public trust.

It is true, Mr. President, that the railroad companies and the stock and bond holders made their investments upon the implied understanding that they would be permitted to charge reasonable rates, but whether rates are reasonable does not depend wholly upon the revenue they will yield. The right of the public to insist upon reasonable rates, upon rates which are reasonable both to the public and to the companies, is superior and paramount to the naked right of the companies to revenue and income. The companies, as a rule, and for obvious reasons, will establish rates chiefly upon considerations of revenue and income, while an impartial and disinterested commission will consider the interests both of the public and the companies.

Under different conditions, when wealth was dispersed and competition in force, the Government wisely abstained from exercising its authority to establish rates. But conditions have changed. Competition has been destroyed by combinations and mergers and traffic arrangements. The railway wealth of the land challenges belief, and its rapid accumulation in the hands of a few, with the stupendous commercial and political and selfish power it exerts, is a dangerous tendency, which, while it may not be averted, should be minimized, directed, and controlled.

Between the public and corporate avarice there stands to-day nothing save the law against extortion, which, in the hands of the private citizen against great aggregations of capital, is a futile and worthless remedy.

Already, Mr. President, the general establishment of rates throughout the United States is dictated by a body of capitalists who control the great systems, not much greater in number than the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the philosophy of this bill is to protect the public in some degree against the selfishness of this combination by conferring limited and emergency powers upon an organized, legal, and impartial tribunal which will represent fairly every interest entitled to consideration, and which will be actuated and guided by principles of justice, and not the merciless and despotic standard of what the traffic will bear. And the public will ultimately come into its own. Special interests may disregard popular rights for a time, may despise and deny and trample upon them for a season, still they will triumph; and, if need be, these interests will be made to feel that the people have not yet lost the spirit of resistance.

Mr. FORAKER. Before the Senator takes his seat I desire to call his attention to the case of the United States against The Union Pacific Railroad Company, reported in 91 United States, at page 72. I call his attention to this case in order to show under what power of Congress it was that the Congress authorized the construction of the Union Pacific Railroad, and particularly to show that it was not even in the exercise of the power to regulate commerce. I want it put into the RECORD now, once for all, for doubtless it will be referred to again. I read from page 79:

> Many of the provisions in the original act of 1862 are outside of the usual course of legislative action concerning grants to railroads, and can not be properly construed without reference to the circumstances which existed when it was passed. The war of the rebellion was in progress; and, owing to complications with England, the country had become alarmed for the safety of our Pacific possessions. The loss of them was feared in case those complications should result in an open rupture; but, even if this fear were groundless, it was quite apparent that we were unable to furnish that degree of protection to the people occupying them which every government owes to its citizens. It is true, the threatened danger was happily averted; but wisdom pointed out the necessity of making suitable provision for the future. This could be done in no better way than by the construction of a railroad across the continent. Such a road would bind together the widely separated parts of our common country, and furnish a cheap and expeditious mode for the transportation of troops and supplies. If it did nothing more than afford the required protection to the Pacific States, it was felt that the Government, in the performance of an imperative duty, could not justly withhold the aid necessary to build it; and so strong and pervading was this opinion that it is by no means certain that the people would not have justified Congress if it had departed from the then settled policy of the country regarding works of internal improvement and charged the Government itself with the direct execution of the enterprise.
> This enterprise was viewed as a national undertaking for national purposes; and the public mind was directed to the end in view, rather than to the particular means of securing it. Although this road was a military necessity, there were other reasons active at the time in producing an opinion for its completion besides the protection of an exposed frontier. There was a vast unpeopled territory lying between the Missouri and Sacramento rivers which was practically worthless without the facilities afforded by a railroad for the transportation of persons and property. With its construction, the agricultural and mineral resources of this territory could be developed, settlements made where settlements were possible, and thereby the wealth and power of the United States largely increased; and there was also the pressing want, in time of peace even, of an improved and cheaper method for the transportation of the mails and of supplies for the Army and the Indians.
> It was in the presence of these facts that Congress undertook to deal with the subject of this railroad. The difficulties in the way of building it were great, and by many intelligent persons considered insurmountable.

I might read more to the same effect, but I have read enough to show, as I said when I interrupted the Senator, that that railroad was chartered and help extended to it by the Government, not in the exercise of the power to regulate commerce, but in the exercise of its power to provide for the common defense, to establish post-roads, and to promote the general welfare. And as it was in the case of the Union Pacific, so, too, was it in every other case where the Government has extended governmental aid by subsidies of land or otherwise.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. FORAKER. And inasmuch as the Government in thus authorizing these roads was exercising its proprietary power—if I can by the use of that word convey what is in my mind—to grant a franchise that authorized a great public highway for great public purposes, it had a right to prescribe the terms and conditions on which that franchise should be taken by the parties who undertook to build the road. Now I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Before the Senator from Texas closes——

Mr. FORAKER. I want to finish what I desire to say to the Senator from Texas; I am not done yet.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. FORAKER. When I yielded I thought the Senator was going to interrupt me.

At another time I may have something to say in answer to some of the comments made by the Senator from Texas upon some of the authorities he commented upon, but for the present I call attention to only one case upon which he commented, and I call attention to that case simply because that is the only one of all the cases upon which the Senator commented that I did not comment upon in the remarks I made a few days ago. So I have already given the Senate the benefit of my views as to the proper construction of the decisions in those cases.

The case I did not call attention to, but desire to call attention to now, is the case of the Philadelphia Steamship Company v. Pennsylvania. The Senator finds in the report of that case some language which indicates that, in the opinion of the court, Congress had power to fix the rates of fare for the transportation of freights and passengers.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. Before the Senator passes from the Union Pacific case, I ask if he has the statute itself there?

Mr. FORAKER. I do not have the statute here, but I am familiar with it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will ask the Senator if the caption does not state that it is intended to regulate commerce?

Mr. KEAN. I know it does not; I have looked at it.

Mr. FORAKER. I am quite sure it does not. If it does, I have never seen it. I know what the Supreme Court has said as to its purpose. Of course I will not say that it does not say that, if the Senator from Texas says it does—I will accept his statement about it; but I will say that the Supreme Court has never said that the act was passed in the exercise of the power to regulate commerce. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] is looking for the statute, and while he is finding it I will proceed with the comments I want to make on the case of the Philadelphia Steamship Company v. Pennsylvania.

I was remarking when the Senator from Texas interrupted me that he cited from the body of the court's opinion some language which indicated that the court was of the opinion that Congress has the power to fix rates for the transportation of freights and passengers. In the remarks I made, to which he was replying in that connection, I used this language, which I do not want the Senator from Texas or any other Senator who speaks to forget. I said:

> I know it has been assumed throughout all this discussion, as it has been in framing this bill, that we have that power and that it is unquestioned, and I know that there are many expressions to be found in the opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States that indicate a similar assumption on the part of that court; but nevertheless the fact remains that the court has never yet passed on that question, and there are many eminent lawyers who are of the opinion that the court will hold, when it does decide that question, that Congress does not have that power.

I could cite quite a number of other expressions by the Supreme Court to which the Senator has not called attention that gave me more concern than this one did; but they were all, as I have said, not necessary to the decision of the case before the court when the particular expression was employed. They were used—I do not like to say so, but it is the truth—in an apparently thoughtless way for purposes of illustration, the court having something else in its mind than the precise question which we now have under consideration. To illustrate: In this case the question before the court was, as shown by the syllabus, which I will read, as follows:

> A State tax upon the gross receipts of a steamship company incorporated under its laws, which are derived from the transportation of persons and property by sea, between different States, and to and from foreign countries, is a regulation of interstate and foreign commerce in conflict with the exclusive powers of Congress under the Constitution.

That is all they decided—that is all it was necessary for them to decide; and their decision in that respect in this case is precisely the same as the one given when Chief Justice Marshall was on the bench in the very celebrated case of McCulloch v. Maryland, with which every Senator here is familiar.

That is all I care to say about that, and I would not have trespassed upon the time of the Senate to say that much, except that happened to be a case on which I did not comment the other day. I did not comment on it because the question before the court was so manifestly a matter that did not raise the question about which we are concerned that I did not think it necessary to make any comment upon it.

Now I have before me, through the kindness of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], the act of July 1, 1862, incorporating the company that constructed the Union Pacific Railroad. The title of it reads as follows:

> An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes.

I am much obliged to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] for asking me a question that has led to my reading the title of that act, for the very title itself supports all I contend for—that the statute was not passed by Congress under the supposition that it was exercising its power to regulate commerce, but in the exercise of its general power to provide post-roads, to provide for the national defense, etc.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CULBERSON. I have yielded the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask a question or two of the Senator from Texas regarding the system of railroad control in Texas. In looking over the statutes of the various States I was struck with the very admirable system of control over corporations generally, and particularly railroad corporations, in Texas, and the provisions of the State constitution and the provisions of law relating to such control.

I understand that in that State the statutes themselves require all construction in that State to be done by railroads organized under the laws of that State, and forbid corporations organized out of the State to construct railroads in it. If I recollect aright, the statute provides for rigid supervision of the issue of securities and stocks of such corporations and limits their dividends to 6 per cent. I wish to ask the Senator from Texas whether the State commission in exercising the power of regulation have any regard at all for the limitation of 6 per cent; whether that matter has ever come up either before the commission or the court, as limiting their powers of control?

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, my attention was diverted for the moment, and I probably did not catch entirely what the Senator said. But I do not understand that under the existing law of Texas there is any limitation of 6 per cent upon the earnings of companies.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then I must be mistaken. Is there no limitation whatever?

Mr. CULBERSON. Except that the rates shall be just and reasonable; that is all.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Is there not some provision that corporations shall receive no more than 6 per cent upon their actual expenditure?

Mr. CULBERSON. I know of no such law in our State.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then I must be mistaken.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have been looking over the act incorporating the Union Pacific Company, and I find the purpose again stated in section 3. I will read it so that it may go into the RECORD with the rest. It says:

> That there be, and is hereby, granted to the said company, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, and to secure the safe and speedy transportation of the mails, troops, munitions of war, and public stores thereon.

Then follows the arrangement about alternate sections. But it sets forth very plainly in that section the purpose of the act. It had no consideration of interstate commerce.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the fact, in connection with the act which the Senator from Ohio quoted in reference to the Union Pacific Railroad, that the question discussed and involved in that case was practically the power of the Federal Government to aid such corporations; and it was put upon the ground that it was an enterprise for the welfare of the General Government to establish post routes, to provide for the carrying of the mail, the carrying of munitions of war, and all that. The question of interstate commerce and its regulation was not involved in the case.

I desire to say further, if the Senator from Ohio intends to make much of the fact that there are no decisions of the Supreme Court directly upon the rate-making power of Congress, that in the nature of the case he and all of us can see that there can not be any decisions directly on that point by the Supreme Court until there has been an attempt to exercise that power. That power, according to the decision of the Supreme Court in the Railroad Commission case, has not been conferred upon the Commission nor has Congress attempted to exercise it, and hence, in the nature of the case, the court never could have passed upon the question directly. No one is warranted in arguing that such a power does not exist simply because of the fact that the Supreme Court has made no decision upon the subject.

Mr. FORAKER. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Minnesota. He has curtailed the labors I had in view very greatly by conceding, as he does, that the Supreme Court never has passed on the question whether or not the Congress has power to prescribe rates. It has been contended all along here that because of certain expressions found in various opinions of the Supreme Court, where that question was not before the court, and, as the Senator says, could not have been before the court, and because of expressions employed by the court in cases arising under State laws, that was a foreclosed question. I have simply been trying to rebut that contention. The Senator ends the whole matter by his very frank concession. He is right about it.

Mr. NELSON. I simply say that the court has never decided the question directly, because it has never been raised before it directly; but what I shall attempt to show is not that the court has expressly decided it, but that the court has laid down the principle time and again which will justify us in our rate-making efforts.

Mr. FORAKER. I understood the Senator fully without the explanation he has now added. Of course, he contends that the principle has been stated by the court, and it is upon the principle he stands, unlike some of his colleagues here who are contending for this legislation along with him. They contend that it is a settled, foreclosed question, not open to discussion.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LODGE. If there is no desire to discuss this matter further this evening, I should like to have a bill passed.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senate desires to proceed to some other business and if no one is ready to go on with the unfinished business, I suggest that it be laid aside and that we go to the Calendar, so as to accommodate Senators.

Mr. LODGE. That is what I want.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. LODGE. I suggest, as is suggested to me by the Senator from New Hampshire, that we go to the Calendar and take up the unobjected bills there. I think that is the fairest way.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered, and the Calendar will be proceeded with.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment to give a notice?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I see by the Calendar that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has given notice that to-morrow, after the routine morning business, he will address the Senate on the pending railroad bill. I desire to say in this connection that, if the Senate will indulge me, at the conclusion of his remarks I will be very glad to have the Senate give me an opportunity to discuss the bill.

AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATIONS.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 345) to provide for an increased annual appropriation for agricultural experiment stations and regulating the expenditure thereof.

Mr. LODGE. I merely wish to say that I was recognized by the Chair to call up a bill and had the floor, and I yielded to the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire that we go to the Calendar. Now, if we are to take up individual bills, I should like to have the recognition which I had at first. If we are to have the regular order, I have nothing to say, but if we are going to have bills called up by individual Senators, I do not care to lose my place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts object to the request of the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. LODGE. I do object unless we are all to call up bills in that way. If we are all going to call up bills in that way, I have no objection in the world. But if we are going to the Calendar, which I think is the fairest way, then I shall object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made. The first bill in order on the Calendar will be stated.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, this bill can not be passed at the present time. I shall at the proper time move to recommit it to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, where it should have gone originally.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

BIG SANDY RIVER BRIDGE, WILLIAMSON, W. VA.

Mr. McCREARY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15263) to authorize William Smith and associates to bridge the Tug Fork of the Big Sandy River, near Williamson, W. Va., where the same forms the boundary line between the States of West Virginia and Kentucky.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY C. MAYERS.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 3842) for the relief of Mary C. Mayers.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, which proposes to pay $5,000 to the widow of Joseph L. Mayers, lately an American citizen residing at Yokohama, Japan, who died on May 7, 1899, as the result of injuries received on May 6, 1899, by the fall of the first whaleboat belonging to the U. S. S. Charleston, then lying in Victoria Harbor, Hongkong, China.

Mr. SPOONER. Let me inquire, did a similar bill pass at the last session?

Mr. HOPKINS. I think not. It was reported favorably by the committee in the Fifty-sixth, the Fifty-seventh, and the Fifty-eighth Congresses, and the Navy Department has reported that the court of inquiry which was had found that the accident was due to the carelessness of the sailors of the Charleston, without any fault or negligence on the part of Mr. Mayers. The amount that is allowed by the bill is only about one-half that allowed in the States against private corporations for the death of an individual without any fault of his own.

Mr. SPOONER. That is all right; but it is a very startling precedent to enter upon to make the Government liable for the negligent acts of its sailors in China, or in the vicinity of China, or in different parts of the world. I recollect the bill now. I think the Senator had better let it go over so that we may look at it.

Mr. HOPKINS. I shall not press it at this time. There is an elaborate report which covers the whole subject.

Mr. SPOONER. There generally is with bills that ought not to pass. I do not mean by that——

Mr. HOPKINS. If the Senator says he knows the bill ought not to pass——

Mr. SPOONER. I am not sure of that.

Mr. HOPKINS. I wish to state that I have formed an entirely different opinion.

Mr. SPOONER. Perhaps I ought not to have said that; but the Senator will see that it involves a very serious question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the present consideration of the bill.

PRESERVATION OF NIAGARA FALLS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 83) for a report, etc., upon the preservation of Niagara Falls.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It requests the members representing the United States upon the International Commission created by section 4 of the river and harbor act of June 13, 1902, to report to Congress, at an early day, what action is, in their judgment, necessary and desirable to prevent the further depletion of water flowing over Niagara Falls; and directs the members to exert, in conjunction with the members of the Commission representing the Dominion of Canada, if practicable, all possible efforts for the preservation of Niagara Falls in their natural condition.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FORAKER. In view of the passage of the joint resolution which has just been acted upon, I move that the joint resolution (S. R. 24) authorizing the President of the United States to invite the Government of Great Britain to join in the formation of an international commission to examine and report upon the diminution in volume of water passing over the Falls of Niagara, reported by me a few days ago from the Committee on Foreign Relations, be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ROANOKE, VA.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2264) to provide for enlarging the public building at Roanoke, Va., in order to accommodate the United States courts.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, additional land for the enlargement of the site of the Federal building in the city of Roanoke, Va., and to cause the building to be extended, remodeled, and enlarged to provide proper accommodations for the United States courts, at a total cost, including additional land, not to exceed $85,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANDREW H. RUSSELL AND WILLIAM R. LIVERMORE.

Mr. LODGE. I ask leave to call up the bill (S. 682) for the relief of Andrew H. Russell and William R. Livermore.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 5, before the name "William R. Livermore," to strike out "Lieutenant-Colonel" and insert "Colonel;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Court of Claims is hereby authorized to take jurisdiction of a suit to be brought by Lieut. Col. Andrew H. Russell and Col. William R. Livermore on account of the alleged infringement of their patent No. 230823 dated August 3, 1880, for a magazine firearm, granted to said Andrew H. Russell, and to render judgment for damages incurred or compensation due for such infringement; and the court is hereby further authorized to receive and consider the testimony already taken in the suit brought in the United States circuit court for the district of Massachusetts by said persons against Col. Alfred Mordecai and dismissed for want of jurisdiction, and such new evidence as may be taken on either side: Provided, That either party shall have the right of appeal from the Court of Claims to the United States Supreme Court under the ordinary rules and regulations governing appeals.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amendment, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

QUARANTINE STATION ON SAN DIEGO BAY.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1830) making appropriation for the removal of the quarantine station at San Diego, Cal., and to acquire a new site, and for other purposes. There is an amendment striking out the appropriation.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine with amendments.

The first amendment was to strike out section 1, in the following words:

That the sum of $200,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of removing the quarantine station at San Diego, Cal., to a new site and the erection thereon of buildings, wharves, and other improvements.

Mr. LODGE. That removes the appropriation, I understand.

Mr. PERKINS. It does.

Mr. LODGE. Is the appropriation provided in another place in the bill?

Mr. PERKINS. That will be attended to later.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2 (1), page 2, line 4, after the word "acquire," to insert "without expense to the United States;" so as to make the section read:

That of the land on Point Loma now owned by the United States and used as a naval reservation a strip 300 feet wide, fronting on San Diego Bay, and extending 1,500 feet in a westerly direction at the northerly end of the said reservation, is hereby transferred to the Treasury Department for use as a quarantine station, subject to the right of way for the military road through the same; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to acquire, without expense to the United States, a strip of submerged land between Portuguese Channel and the main channel in San Diego Bay, 700 feet wide, the same being located to the north of the present quarantine station and in front of the said north end of the above-mentioned reservation, for the purpose of constructing wharves, detention buildings, etc., on piling, and to be considered as a part and parcel of the new site for the quarantine station.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the removal of the quarantine station at San Diego, Cal., and to acquire a new site, and for other purposes."

FORT RICE MILITARY RESERVATION LANDS.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2450) for the relief of settlers upon the abandoned Fort Rice Military Reservation.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that all persons now having or who may hereafter file homestead applications upon any of the lands situate within the abandoned Fort Rice Military Reservation, in the State of North Dakota, shall be entitled to a patent to the land filed upon by such person upon compliance with the provisions of the homestead law of the United States and proper proof thereof, and shall not be required to pay the appraised values of such lands in addition to such compliance with the homestead law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF JOHN C. RIVES.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the consideration of the bill (S. 4376) to quitclaim all the interest of the United States of America in and to a certain lot of land lying in the District of Columbia and State of Maryland to heirs of John C. Rives, deceased.

I will state that a similar bill has passed the Senate two or three times, and it is one the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] is greatly interested in.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It requires the Secretary of the Interior to grant and convey unto the heirs and assigns of John C. Rives, deceased, of Maryland, all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to a certain lot of land lying partly in the District of Columbia and the State of Maryland, consisting of about 52 acres, more or less, as described in the will of John C. Rives.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT ATTORNEY FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, I ask for the passage of House resolution 350.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to communicate to Congress what sums, if any, he or his predecessors in office have approved between January 1, 1898, and January 1, 1906, and paid from the appropriation for collecting the revenue from customs or otherwise, to United States district attorneys, under Revised Statutes, section 827, as extra compensation for work done by said district attorneys in customs cases originating prior to the customs administrative act of June, 1890, stating in detail the number of said cases, the respective ports at which said cases were pending, and the amounts paid to each of said district attorneys.

The Secretary is also requested to inform Congress what the character of the services was which were rendered by said district attorneys for which said extra compensation was allowed; and, further, having in view the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States rendered July 8, 1889 (19 Opinions Attorneys-General, p. 354), that the Secretary of the Treasury has the right to scrutinize, reverse, and cut down all charges for such services certified by the court under said Revised Statutes, section 827, whether any charges so certified in these cases have been cut down or reversed; and if any, what these were in detail.

The Secretary is further requested to communicate to Congress whether or not any extra compensation has been allowed or paid to district attorneys under said section 827, Revised Statutes, since the act of March 3, 1905, prohibiting the receipt of fees by United States district attorneys in addition to the salary allowed them by law; and if so, the amounts so paid, the district attorneys who received the same, and the character of the services rendered.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Amend in line 7, before the words "United States," by inserting the word "the;" strike out the word "attorneys" and insert in lieu thereof the word "attorney," in line 7; and insert in line 7, between the word "attorneys" and the word "under," the words "and of the southern district of New York."

Amend in line 9 by striking out the word "attorneys" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "attorney."

Amend in line 12 by striking out all after the words "said cases."

Amend line 13 by striking out the word "pending" and the word "to" after the word "paid" and insert in lieu thereof the word "in;" strike out the balance of said line.

Amend line 14 by striking out the word "attorneys."

Amend line 15 by striking out the word "what" and insert in lieu thereof the word "of."

Amend line 16 by striking out the words "was which were" after the word "services" and before the word "rendered."

Amend line 1 on page 2 by striking out the word "attorneys" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "attorney."

Amend line 14 by inserting the word "said" after the word "to;" and amend further by striking out the word "attorneys" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "attorney."

Amend line 19 by striking out, after the word "paid," the words "the district attorneys who receive the same."

The amendments were agreed to.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

INCREASING CERTAIN PENALTIES IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 11275) increasing the penalty for certain offenses in the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] calls up for consideration the following bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the penal clause in the first paragraph of the act of Congress approved July 8, 1898, entitled "An act to amend 'An act for the preservation of the public peace and protection of property in the District of Columbia,' approved July 29, 1892," be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows: "under penalty of a fine not to exceed $100, or imprisonment not to exceed six months, or both such fine and imprisonment." And that the last sentence of the last paragraph of the said act of Congress approved July 8, 1898, entitled "An act to amend 'An act for the preservation of the public peace and protection of property in the District of Columbia,' approved July 29, 1892," be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows: "That the taking and carrying away of the property of another in the District of Columbia without right so to do shall be a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine not to exceed $100, or imprisonment for a term not to exceed six months, or both."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to know something about this bill. I understand there are two sections of the bill, one of which increases penalties for crimes defined by existing law. I would like to know what the offenses are for which the penalties are increased.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH], the chairman of the subcommittee on the Judiciary, who reported the bill.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, this bill seeks to amend two paragraphs of the law of July 8, 1898. The first paragraph provides a penalty for disfiguring or injuring property. Heretofore the penalty has been $50. This amendment seeks to make the penalty $100 or imprisonment, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. For the destruction of or injury to property?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. For destroying, injuring, chipping, and so forth.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. What is ordinarily called "malicious trespass?"

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. It is known in the statutes of various States as a "misdemeanor" to injure property.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does it require a willful or malicious or intentional destruction of property? Would a penalty attach to an accidental or unintentional destruction of property?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. No, sir.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think from the gentleman's statement it would.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Well, if the gentleman has the report, he will find, on page 2, the original statute. I might read the whole of the paragraph.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. What does the paragraph provide, if the gentleman can explain it without taking time to read it? What kind of destruction or injury to property?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. It says:

That it shall not be lawful for any person or persons to destroy, injure, disfigure, cut, chip, break, deface, or cover or rub with or otherwise place filth or excrement of any kind upon any property, public or private, in the District of Columbia, or any public or private building, statue, monument, office, dwelling, or structure of any kind, or which may be in course of erection, or the doors, windows, steps, railing, fencing, balconies, balustrades, stairs, porches, or halls, or the walls or sides, or the walls of any inclosure thereof; or to write, mark, or paint obscene or indecent words or language thereon, or to draw, paint, mark, or write obscene or indecent figures representing obscene or indecent objects; or to write, mark, draw, or paint any other word, sign, or figure thereon, without the consent of the owner or proprietor thereof, or, in case of public property, of the person having charge, custody, or control thereof.

And the original penalty was not more than $50 for each and every such offense.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It seems to me that under that statute an accidental destruction of property would bring on the penalty, or a necessary destruction, even.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. If the gentleman thinks it is necessary to insert the word "willful" in the original statute there will be no objection to that.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The word "willful" or "unnecessary" ought to be included in the statute. The penalty is already too high, it seems to me, for the crime that the statute describes. If there be an accidental injury, however careful one may be, he is subject to the penalty under that statute. It is unqualified, and I suggest that the gentleman include in the statute the qualification "willful and unnecessary."

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I do not think if it were shown to the satisfaction of the court it was accidental there would be any fine imposed. The court would find out whether or not it was willful.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The court could not avoid it under the terms of that statute. This is a statutory offense, and I undertake to say there is no State in this country that makes it a crime to injure property unless there be present the element of willfulness or wantonness, and the injury must be unnecessary. Most of the States require the element of malice. That is the crime that we ordinarily term "malicious trespass"—malicious injury to property.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I have no idea that a court would allow a verdict to stand a minute, unless it was clearly shown that the act was willful.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman submit an amendment putting in the word "malicious," or "unnecessary and wanton?"

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. The gentleman from Missouri desires to be heard for one moment.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I just want to ask the gentleman from Indiana if they are not on their face willful acts? I may call to his attention one of the specific acts that caused us to report this bill. It seems that some person wanting to take souvenirs from Washingon went over to the Washington Monument and chipped off a part of the marble blocks as souvenirs. Now, $50 fine is insufficient for that sort of vandalism. This merely affects the penalty for those who shall do certain things which upon the face of the statute themselves are willful. I have no objection to inserting the words "whoever shall maliciously and wantonly."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think the words "maliciously and wantonly" should be inserted. I should not use the word "unnecessary."

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Why is not "willful" sufficient?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is not in the bill. It will not take any more time to put both in.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. "Malicious" covers "wrongfully."

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. We could insert it in the first line by saying "willfully destroy."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Propose that.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. "Willfully and maliciously."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I suggest "wantonly" as the better word.

Mr. PAYNE. Make it "willfully" or "wantonly."

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I think that the words "willfully" or "wantonly" would be better. I remember that when they were recodifying the laws in Massachusetts they rejected the word "maliciously" because of the fact that they would have to prove personal malice against the owner of the property. Therefore they used the word "wantonly."

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. There will be no objection to that.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I wish the gentleman from Michigan would propose an amendment to that end.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I will say that the present bill does not affect the legislation that the gentlemen are talking about at all. This simply deals with the penalties and does not touch the law; so that it would be impossible to amend this bill without reenacting the present statute, which the bill does not touch.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, let me say this: It seems to me the manner and method of making this amendment is a very poor one. It is an unscientific one. I think in making an amendment to penal statutes, particularly, that the section as amended ought to be set out in the bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes; but it does not touch the section.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And if the law is as the gentleman explains, the penalty is already too high. The crime that the original section undertakes to define is not recognized as a crime in any State of this country, and it ought not to be here. There would be, it seems to me, absolutely no escape from the punishment of a man entirely innocent, who might do some injury to private or public property. Now, there is another thing I want to criticise in the second paragraph or section of the bill. I understand the second section of the bill directly abolishes the crime of larceny, because it says, "Whoever takes away the goods of another shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." It does not say "wrongfully," but "Whoever takes away the property of another shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. That has been the law since 1898.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If the gentleman has an extra copy of the bill, I would like to see it. Maybe I have misunderstood it.

I believe the gentleman had better withdraw this bill and put it in shape. If you amend the original section, you ought to put in a qualifying clause to the original section, so as to make the "wanton and unnecessary destruction" of property a crime without making the accidental or innocent injury of property punishable by fine and imprisonment. I do not believe that law ought to be executed, and while the committee is recommending an amendment, I suggest they recommend an amendment of the entire section, so as to make it denounce crimes that are wrong and criminal in principle, and not punish acts that may be entirely innocent.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, in regard to the amendments of the gentleman from Indiana, I would say that this particular amendment which is suggested to the present statute is solely in cases of wanton and willful destruction. The gentleman from Indiana surely must understand that no judge before whom is brought a person accused of taking souvenirs from the public offices of the United States—not a case of accidental breaking of an object—is going to convict him. The present penalty as it exists to-day is found to be insufficient. There have been cases over and over again in this District where souvenir hunters have chipped off pieces of the statuary in the Capitol itself, and my own personal opinion is that the penalty is absolutely needed when anyone is convicted of the crime.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, a suggestion, if the gentleman will permit it. I understood from the reading of the law by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH] that the offense it creates is not confined to public property at all, and it is not necessary that the destruction of property be wanton, willful, or malicious. What I am complaining about is that, as I gather from the reading of the law by the gentleman from Michigan, an innocent injury to property, however excusable, is made a misdemeanor under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. OLCOTT. The gentleman from Indiana can not possibly believe that any judge would ever convict a person of a misdemeanor if he had accidently destroyed private property.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Why give him such power?

Mr. OLCOTT. He has not the power under this bill any more than he has under the law as it now stands.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This is a statutory offense, and the question of willfulness, it has been repeatedly held throughout the country, is not a necessary element in a statutory offense. Now, you make it an offense to injure property, without regard to the question of intention, without any regard to the question of necessity; and when a case is presented to a judge under that statute I do not see how he can by interpretation construe the statute to mean that the act must be willful or wanton or unnecessary. Those words are not in the statute.

Mr. OLCOTT. This is the provision of the statute that is now on the books, and has been on the books for years, and no difficulty whatever has arisen. The sole object of this bill is to increase the penalty for the breaking or defacing of public or private property.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. But you increase the penalty, and you make it apply to wanton and malicious offenses, and this act does not come up to the penalty—in other words, you make the punishment, proper for a wanton offense, apply to a perfectly innocent or negligent act.

Mr. OLCOTT. The gentleman from Massachusetts surely understands that no judge would convict a person under those circumstances.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I am not willing to intrust such discretion to a judge in a criminal case.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I wish to make a suggestion. Let us strike out all after the enacting clause and make it read:

That the first and last paragraphs of the act of Congress approved July 8, 1898, entitled "An act to amend an act for the preservation of the public peace and protection of property in the District of Columbia, approved July 29, 1892," be, and the same are hereby, amended so as to read as follows.

Then, in the first paragraph, before "destroy," insert "willfully or wantonly."

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. How can we do that here? Your bill only deals with the penalties.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. We can strike out all after the enacting clause and provide simply for these two paragraphs with that amendment.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. You mean to read them into this statute?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Very well.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I think that will be satisfactory.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Let the gentleman from Michigan propose that amendment.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: "That the first and last paragraphs of the act of Congress approved July 8, 1898, entitled 'An act to amend "An act for the preservation of the public peace and protection of property in the District of Columbia," approved July 29, 1892,' be, and the same are hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

FIRST PARAGRAPH.

"'That it shall not be lawful for any person or persons to willfully or wantonly destroy, injure, disfigure, cut, chip, break, deface, or cover or rub with or otherwise place filth or excrement of any kind upon any property, public or private, in the District of Columbia, or any public or private building, statue, monument, office, dwelling, or structure of any kind, or which may be in course of erection, or the doors, windows, steps, railing, fencing, balconies, bulustrades, stairs, porches, or halls, or the walls or sides, or the walls of any inclosure thereof; or to write, mark, or paint obscene or indecent words or language thereon; or to draw, paint, mark, or write obscene or indecent figures representing obscene or indecent objects; or to write, mark, draw, or paint any other word, sign, or figure thereon, without the consent of the owner or proprietor thereof, or, in case of public property, of the person having charge, custody, or control thereof, under penalty of a fine not to exceed $100, or imprisonment not to exceed six months, or both such fine and imprisonment.'

LAST PARAGRAPH.

"'That it shall not be lawful for any person or persons to make any obscene or indecent exposure of his or her person or their persons in any street, avenue or alley, road or highway, open space, public square, or other public place or inclosure, in the District of Columbia, or to make any such obscene or indecent exposure of person in any dwelling or other building or other place wherefrom the same may be seen in any street, avenue, alley, road, or highway, open space, public square, or public or private building or inclosure, under a penalty not to exceed $250 for each and every such offense. That the taking and carrying away of the property of another in the District of Columbia without right to do so shall be a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine not to exceed $100, or imprisonment for a term not to exceed six months, or both.'"

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I think that covers it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ERECTION OF FIRE ESCAPES IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 122, an act to require the erection of fire escapes in certain buildings in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, which is on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 122) to require the erection of fire escapes in certain buildings in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. SIMS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin to explain the effect of the Senate amendments.

Mr. BABCOCK. They are not material, but I will refer the gentleman to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR], who is more familiar with the matter.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the first amendment simply inserts the word "or" between the words "height" and "over," making line 5 on page 1 read, "three or more stories in height or over 30 feet in height." That was in the original bill, and it does not make any material difference.

The second amendment, on page 2, line 7, strikes out all after the word "story" down to and including the word "feet," in line 10. Section 2 provides that in any building already erected or which may hereafter be erected in which ten or more persons are employed at the same time in any of the stories above the second story, they shall be provided with certain fire escapes. In the original bill it eliminated that if they had two or more stairways each 3 feet wide and separated from each other by a distance of at least 30 feet. The Senate strikes out that provision as to the two stairways.

The next amendment is, on page 4, line 14, the $50 fine is stricken out and $5 a day inserted, which, we think, is perhaps right. That is, for a noncompliance with the notice and not for a noncompliance with the act itself in failing to provide a fire escape. On page 4, line 25, the Senate has inserted this language: "Unless the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall in their discretion deem it necessary to extend the time." The bill now provides for ninety days for compliance with the notice, and this puts it in the discretion of the Commissioners to extend the time.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

UNLAWFUL WEARING OF BADGES OF THE GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill H. R. 58, which is on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 58) to prevent the unlawful wearing of the badge or insignia of the Grand Army of the Republic, or other soldier organizations, with a Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

REAL ESTATE CORPORATIONS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill (S. 1244) to amend section 605 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, relating to corporations.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 605 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the proviso contained therein, so that said section will read as follows:

"SEC. 605. CERTIFICATE.—Any three or more persons who desire to form a company for the purpose of carrying on any enterprise or business which may be lawfully conducted by an individual, excepting banks of circulation or discount, railroads, and such other enterprise or business as may be otherwise specially provided for in this code, may make, sign, and acknowledge, before some officer competent to take the acknowledgment of deeds, and file in the office of the recorder of deeds a certificate in writing."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear some explanation of this bill.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, this bill, passed by the Senate, is to enable corporations to be formed for the buying and selling of real estate. That power does not now exist in the law of the District of Columbia relating to corporations. There are many corporations dealing in real estate in the District, but they have to go to other places where such corporations are authorized and then come back here and deal as foreign corporations. The bill has passed the Senate, and an amendment has been reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia limiting the capital of such corporations to $500,000 and their borrowing capacity to $250,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether the investigation of the committee determined what capitalization the companies now operating in the District have?

Mr. OLCOTT. Does the gentleman mean the entire amount of capital now invested in the District by foreign corporations?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; the capital of any one of the foreign corporations now dealing in real estate.

Mr. OLCOTT. I can not answer the question positively, but I think none of them exceed $500,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to inquire if the gentleman thinks that $500,000 is a sufficient margin?

Mr. OLCOTT. The amount of $500,000 was adopted by the committee after considerable discussion. As far as I am individually concerned, I do not think $500,000 is a sufficient limit, but this has the approval of the District Commissioners.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Is there any limit to the amount of real estate the corporation may hold?

Mr. OLCOTT. Only the limitation of the capital to $500,000 and the borrowing of money to the extent of $250,000.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Did the committee take into consideration the general policy against corporations holding real estate?

Mr. OLCOTT. That was examined into, and it was found that eight-tenths of the States in the Union authorized such corporations, and there is nothing to preclude such corporations from speculating in real estate here in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Would it not be possible for half a dozen of these corporations to combine and control the real estate in the District of Columbia?

Mr. OLCOTT. I presume it would be possible for half a dozen of them to control probably six times $750,000; yes, sir.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. And in that manner establish a monopoly in land, which has been the reason for forbidding this very class of corporations.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I think there is no possible danger of a monopoly in land being established by the forming of a sufficient number of corporations in view of the fact that the limitation of their holdings in real estate must be $750,000.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Inasmuch as there is no limit to the number of those who may form such corporations, we may still have the bulk of the real estate of the District held by corporations dealing in real estate.

Mr. OLCOTT. Of course there is no limitation as to the number of either individuals or corporations who may own real estate, and I presume it would be possible for a number of individuals to gather together and control a very large portion of the real estate in any city.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Masachusetts. But when the ididividual dies the estate is distributed, which is not the case with a corporation, which is one of the principal reasons for excluding corporations from owning and dealing in real estate.

Mr. OLCOTT. I understand that perfectly, but this has worked so admirably, especially for people who are unable to own large quantities of real estate, to be interested in a corporation holding real estate, and therefore be enabled to reap the benefit of the better investments in real estate. That has been the experience throughout the country.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does not the gentleman believe it would be a good deal better for the individuals of a city to own their own homes than to own stock in a corporation that buys the land and constructs the houses and rents them out to the individual?

Mr. OLCOTT. I think that is undoubtedly so, and I think the experience of all real estate operators is that the homes of the people are seldom owned for any considerable time by these corporations formed to buy, improve, and sell real estate. The policy of such companies is to sell speedily.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There is no reason why if it should become profitable with the corporations that will be organized under this bill, if it becomes a law—there is no reason why they could not go into the business of buying and platting additions and building houses and renting them out perpetually.

Mr. OLCOTT. Absolutely no reason if it was found profitable, nor is there any reason why the individual should prefer to rent from them rather than to buy his own modest home.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. My own idea in relation to corporations has been that they should be created only for the purpose of carrying on some enterprise of an industrial or commercial character, and that the land in this country ought to be left for the individual; that the farms and homes and business buildings ought to be owned in the main by individuals. I am therefore opposed to the bill.

Mr. OLCOTT. I would say to the gentleman from Indiana in regard to that, even though he opposes this bill for the reasons that he suggests, that does not prevent the foreign corporations from coming in and acting now in the District of Columbia, and it is surely better to give the District of Columbia itself an opportunity to form its own corporations and to allow it to control them than it is to allow foreign corporations to come in and regulate the business.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I believe it would be infinitely better if Congress should enact a law prohibiting any corporation in the District of Columbia from owning more land than is reasonably necessary to carry out the purposes of its creation, and to prevent corporations either in the District of Columbia or elsewhere from engaging in the business of buying and selling and speculating in the farms and homes of the country.

Mr. OLCOTT. I think that these corporations have been created, as in many instances, to enable them to build homes with the express purpose of selling them, and I believe that if the gentleman will investigate he will find that these corporations that have erected buildings for homes have not adopted the plan of leasing them, but have always undertaken to sell the land which they had improved to the individual.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Speaker, who asks for this legislation?

Mr. OLCOTT. The legislation was asked after consultation by the District of Columbia Commissioners with members of the Bar Association, who became aware of the fact that no corporation could be established here, created by the laws of the District of Columbia, for this purpose, whereas foreign corporations could come in and do business.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. It seems to me that we should not affirmatively put the stamp of our approval upon foreign corporations doing business of this kind in the District.

Mr. OLCOTT. I would say——

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Just hear me one moment further. I do not believe it is a wise thing to authorize corporations to organize and do real estate business under Federal law in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Why should not the citizens of Washington have the same right the citizens of the State of Michigan have?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Because this is the Federal capital, and the lands involved should challenge the concern of the Government. I will say to the gentleman that the growth and development of this city is a standing protest against that kind of property control. Originally it was intended that this city should be extended east of the capitol, but the real estate speculators got hold of the property about this building and forced the city in an unnatural channel.

Mr. OLCOTT. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that I yielded for him to ask me a question and not for the purpose of making an argument.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I will detain the gentleman but a moment. Real estate speculators have ample scope in the District now without this legislation, and I think it is an outrage to allow the organization of gigantic corporations here to deal in land in the District of Columbia, and I protest against it.

Mr. OLCOTT. I understand the question of the gentleman from Michigan was as to why we should put an affirmative permission to establish these corporations on the statute books.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Yes.

Mr. OLCOTT. I call his attention to the fact that that is exactly what we are not doing. We are amending this section 605 of the Code by eliminating the words "Provided, That nothing shall be held to authorize the organization of corporations to buy, sell, or deal in real estate, etc.," because the bar association and many residents of the District have found that outside corporations were doing what the citizens of Washington themselves could not do, and they have therefore asked us to pass this amendment. The bill is approved by the Commissioners.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The explanation of the gentleman from New York is probably satisfactory to himself, but if I had my way about it I would not permit a foreign corporation to deal in real estate in the District of Columbia; neither would I grant a charter of this kind to any three men.

Mr. OLCOTT. That is another question.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. May I call the gentleman's attention to one phase of the subject? Has the committee inquired whether or not in practice this limitation which the amendment imposes may not be easily overridden? Now, then, you do not limit the number of corporations that may be formed for the purpose of owning real estate in this District, which, I will call to the attention of the gentleman, is only 10 miles square. Now, then, is it not perfectly easy for the members of real estate corporations that have prospered to form another corporation with the same members for $500,000, and so on, ad libitum? Furthermore, is it not perfectly feasible, after they have got the business in this corporate form with a capitalization, we will say, of a total of $6,000,000, to unite under a trust agreement and——

Mr. OLCOTT. The gentleman is asking so many questions I fear I may forget some of them.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I have only asked two.

Mr. OLCOTT. They are very long. I think it is possible for several corporations to be formed, but that possibility exists to-day with foreign corporations, and it has never worked any injury.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, as this bill passed the Senate it allowed companies to be incorporated under the laws of the District for the purposes of buying and selling and dealing in real estate without any limitation whatever as to the amount of the capital stock or indebtedness. My own view is that the law should not permit companies to be incorporated for such purposes. It is against public policy to allow large accumulations of real estate in a single person or a single corporation. Land should, as far as possible, be distributed among the people. Nothing could be more injurious to the public welfare than monopoly of land ownership. While I was individually opposed to allowing companies to become incorporated for the purpose of dealing in real estate, yet I realized that a majority of the committee and probably a majority of this House would hold the opposite view. Therefore, in committee I moved to amend the Senate bill by providing a limitation on the amount of capital stock and indebtedness of such companies, making it impossible for them to own any very large amount of land. With those amendments the Senate bill has been reported to the House and is now up for consideration. I hope that these limitations upon the amount of capital stock and the indebtedness of such companies will be adopted. Even with those amendments the bill ought to fail, but certainly without them it would be a very dangerous measure.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. To illustrate the point a little further, I will say that in Massachusetts we have a trust which controls practically all of the street-railway corporations in that State, and the articles of association have not been questioned in the courts. That is what I had in mind when I suggested that a similar trust agreement would cover the business of a dozen of these real estate corporations. Now, a dozen real estate corporations, each capitalized at $500,000, could control for all practical purposes the entire real estate business of the district.

Mr. OLCOTT. I am perfectly free to confess that I do not know whether the laws would allow a trust company to manage half a dozen different corporations in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Unless there is some express prohibition, certainly the law will allow it.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Let me call the gentleman's attention to this: When we authorized the construction of the new Union Depot there was an abundance of cheap land all around it for sale, and I contend that it was not becoming for individual citizens of the District of Columbia to buy this land and undertake to thwart a great public work of this character.

Mr. OLCOTT. I would say to the gentleman from Michigan that the Government can very easily condemn any property that is necessary for their use.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Let the gentleman from New York ask the chairman of his committee how easily they can do it.

Mr. OLCOTT. That is because, unfortunately, we have gentlemen who do not accept the things we do in the District of Columbia room.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. When the depot proposition was before the House I called the attention of the House to the fact that property owners and speculators would organize against the Government's interests, but it would have been infinitely worse if land corporations could have entered the field with more means and less conscience.

Mr. OLCOTT. I am unable to say how the passage of this bill would make it any more easy to have these things happen.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Because a corporation without any soul and without any interest in the Government can corner the desirable land and defeat or delay progress.

Mr. OLCOTT. A corporation of $750,000 is not going to do a vast amount of damage to the property of the District of Columbia, especially when foreign corporations from all over can come and go up as high as the limitations of their own States allow.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. We have not restricted them, but we ought to do so, and I hope Congress will take action to limit or curtail their right to do business here.

Mr. OLCOTT. They will come for a little while only if you pass this bill and permit the citizens of Washington to allow them to do what the corporations of other States have the right to do.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. We ought to scrupulously guard the rights of the Government and the people in the lands of the District and follow out the plan with the least possible delay of making this city the pride of every citizen of the country. This legislation will not contribute to that end—it might embarrass it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. When a corporation is created under this act, why its charter is irrepealable. Its charter amounts to a contract, a vested right, and it will be found that next year or the year after, if you undertake to change the policy, half a dozen real-estate corporations will have been created under this statute.

Mr. OLCOTT. It will put a corporation created under the laws of the District of Columbia in the same condition as corporations existing and created under the laws of other States.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Excepting we have the power to exclude foreign corporations from doing business here.

Mr. OLCOTT. You can not exclude foreign corporations from doing business here if you interfere with vested rights they have.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We can prevent them from obtaining any additional vested rights, and I think this bill is not good public policy. I do not believe that corporations ought to be permitted to engage in the general business of buying and selling and trading in real estate anywhere.

Mr. OLCOTT. Has the gentleman from Indiana found that this has worked a great hardship in his own State, where it is allowed?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think not. I think corporations ought to be confined in their ownership of real estate to the reasonable purposes of their creation. I think the people of the country ought to be the repositories of real-estate titles and the owners of the farms and the homes of the land.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Especially in this District, the national capital.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the passage of the bill.

Mr. SIMS. How much time has the gentleman left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has forty minutes.

Mr. SIMS. I do not think I will use forty minutes.

Mr. OLCOTT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SIMS. Five minutes is nothing. I opposed this bill in the committee and all the way through, and it is not possible for me to present the matter in five minutes.

Mr. OLCOTT. I will give the gentleman from Tennessee any reasonable time he wants.

Mr. SIMS. I would not use twenty minutes, but the gentleman knows that interruptions may cause me to use more time than I think will be necessary now.

Mr. OLCOTT. I yield the gentleman fifteen minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Well, then, I may want more.

Mr. OLCOTT. Well, then, you can ask it.

Mr. SIMS. I will trust to the gentleman's generosity. I hope I may have order and attention. I did not have time to prepare and submit my views as a member of the minority, nor do I think it was necessary. In order that the House may understand this bill, I desire first to state that two or three years ago we enacted a Code of Laws for the District of Columbia. That Code of Laws had been specially prepared by a committee of citizens of the District of Columbia, who had charge of it for more than ten years. That code prohibited the organization of corporations for the purpose of dealing in real estate. Now, this bill is to repeal that section of the code of the District of Columbia prohibiting such corporations which this House enacted by an almost unanimous vote only a little while ago. Now, what the effect of it will be has been stated as well as I can by the gentleman from Michigan, the gentleman from Massachusetts, and the gentleman from Indiana. It is not a bill to permit a corporation to buy real estate for the purpose of carrying out its corporate business, like a manufactory, or anything of that sort. It is a bill to permit the organization of a corporation to buy and sell real estate, just like a syndicate, or like an individual, for purely speculative purposes, in the limited area of the District of Columbia, one-half of it now owned by the Government of the United States in public buildings and in streets, alleys, and parks. You can see how dangerous a proposition of this kind may be when worked out in detail. It organizes a corporation with a capital of half a million dollars. It does not have to buy only a half million dollars' worth of real estate. It can buy it, mortgage it, and with that amount of capital it can buy up and hold almost all the unimproved property in the District of Columbia and hold away from the home builder.

Mr. OLCOTT. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. OLCOTT. Under the limitation placed upon them in the bill they can not borrow more than $250,000, and they must capitalize at $500,000. Now, how, then, can they buy up all the unimproved property in the District?

Mr. SIMS. They can buy on a credit, with a lien retained on all except a small amount.

Mr. OLCOTT. Then they will owe more than $250,000.

Mr. SIMS. They will be owing a debt on the purchase money, but not borrowed money.

Mr. OLCOTT. They can not be indebted for more than $250,000.

Mr. SIMS. You say they can not be indebted for more than $250,000?

Mr. OLCOTT. They can not be indebted for more than $250,000, and if they own property with a lien for a greater amount, they violate the statute on which they are created.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman think they can only owe $250,000?

Mr. OLCOTT. They can not owe more than $250,000.

Mr. SIMS. With all becoming modesty, I disagree as to that. But if it is only $100,000, or $10,000, the object of the bill is vicious. In this limited area, with already more than one-half owned by the United States, and the fact that the Government will have to acquire additional real estate from time to time, this bill will permit a corporation to buy up and hold real estate and force a much higher price with its power and influence, which no individual could exercise for purely speculative purposes. There would then be but little real estate left for the home owner; and we should give the greatest possible opportunity to the home owner to buy and own his own home, and not allow all the land to be acquired by corporations created for no other purpose than to get speculative profits. They can organize as many as they want to. This bill is not limited to one corporation; you can have 20 or 40 or 100 buying and selling real estate and competing with the people who need real estate for homes, however humble they may be.

Every once in a while I see stated in the paper that some association of gentlemen get together and say that "We need a new park somewhere." We need this, that, and the other, and they start in to get Congress to buy up this land, when the property has been bought up for the purpose of unloading it on the Government by action of Congress.

This is one of the possibilities of this legislation, if not its object. It will permit innumerable corporations to be organized here that can buy every available foot of unoccupied territory in this District and force home purchasers or the Government to pay the price they demand. Now, this committee and Congress, which had the code under consideration for many years before it was finally enacted, proceeded with deliberation and wisdom when they prohibited corporations of this kind. And why? In order that three or five or one hundred men may combine together as a corporation and buy and hold real property and keep it out of the market, simply that they may put speculative profits in their pockets. Shall we pass such a bill as this? I say this legislation is vicious. The amassing of large areas of real estate and holding it out of improvement for speculative purposes has been a great injury to this country, and it will damage any country where it is permitted.

Mr. BEDE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. BEDE. I should like to inquire if foreign corporations can now own property here?

Mr. SIMS. You mean foreign in the sense of not being domiciled in the District of Columbia?

Mr. BEDE. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. I understand they can, but not in the sense maintained by the gentleman from New York; but the fact that foreign corporations can come here and buy up real estate and hold it and put upon it an artificial and speculative value is no reason why we should ratify that wrong and enforce it by passing this bill, allowing District of Columbia corporations to do the same thing. In the case of the foreign corporation we have the power to prohibit it.

Mr. KENNEDY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. KENNEDY of Ohio. I am going to oppose this bill, but I want to ask this gentleman a question. There is a clause in the Constitution which confers upon citizens of the States all the privileges, rights, and immunities of the citizens of the several States. If we pass this bill and give to a citizen of the District of Columbia, to wit, the new corporation, the right to speculate and traffic in land, do we not, by that very act, tie our hands from ever interfering with the corporations from the States coming here and carrying on the same business?

Mr. SIMS. I think so, undoubtedly.

Mr. KENNEDY of Ohio. Is it not true that if we do not confer upon any corporation in the District of Columbia that power, then we can say to the corporations which come here from the various States to do business, "Thus far and no farther shalt thou go," at any time?

Mr. SIMS. I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. OLCOTT. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. OLCOTT. Do you mean to say by that that the passage of this bill is going to have any effect on what we may do hereafter with foreign corporations?

Mr. SIMS. I do not think we could organize——

Mr. OLCOTT. Is it not true that you can pass a bill to-day to prevent foreign corporations from having anything to do in the District of Columbia, prohibiting them from running a bank or a trust company or anything of that sort, or to speculate in real estate; but that you can not interfere with the rights that have already been obtained by existing law?

Mr. SIMS. We could not do that unless the law (as nearly all District of Columbia laws provide) contains a provision for the alteration, amendment, or repeal of the statute. In such case we can do as we please.

Mr. OLCOTT. But there is not any law now to prevent foreign corporations operating here?

Mr. SIMS. Well, if there is not, I am certainly in favor of having such a law; I mean to prevent them operating in the way that this bill provides. I should like to see such a law passed at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. OLCOTT. But the gentleman from Tennessee knows that we can not make that law retroactive.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, no, but we can stop encouraging such a practice, and we can refuse to make it legal, or to provide for it in the future, if such is the case.

Mr. OLCOTT. Are you afraid of the moral effect of this law in that regard?

Mr. SIMS. If it has anything but a bad effect or can have anything but a bad effect I am at a loss to know what it is. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what foreign corporations can do or are doing, but I take the word of the gentleman from New York as being correct. Still that does not warrant the passage of this bill.

The District Committee had charge of the code for weeks and months, and the subcommittee of the Judiciary, of which the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] was the chairman, now the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, after deliberation—and long deliberation—decided that no such authority should be given, and now we come in here with very little consideration and repeal that provision of the Code of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Is it not true that with all the consideration given to the code at nearly every meeting of the Committee on the District of Columbia we were asked to amend it?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, undoubtedly, and we always will be so far as that is concerned, because no code of laws can be made perfect.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Is not the gentleman mistaken also when he suggests that this matter has not been given most careful consideration by the Committee on the District of Columbia?

Mr. SIMS. I will say "Yes"—I mean consideration of the bill creating the code—at least by the gentleman from Wisconsin, the chairman of the Judiciary subcommittee having charge of it, because they worked for months to my certain knowledge. I was on the subcommittee, but did not do as much work as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] did.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is the gentleman opposed to permitting corporations to own property at all in the District of Columbia?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, no; they can own it for corporate purposes—for the purpose of manufacturing or performing some function that requires a certain amount of real estate. I do not object to the street car company owning lands for their purposes, but this is a corporation purely speculative. The object and purpose of it is to buy and sell real estate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In the different States there are corporations organized under similar laws to this, not speculative, that are known as "development companies." They purchase tracts of outlying districts and build houses at a moderate price and place them upon the market under very favorable conditions. People are enabled in that way to buy and eventually own their own homes through the operation of such companies when they could never purchase them in any other way. Is not that a benefit to the community?

Mr. SIMS. I think that undoubtedly is a benefit to any such community, but I desire to say that there is no parallel to be drawn between this narrow contracted piece of land called the "District of Columbia" and a great State having hundreds of square miles of absolutely undeveloped territory.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But these companies, as a rule, do not operate throughout the States. They are confined to simply parts of municipalities, where they go into the undeveloped portions of municipalities and by their actions tend to develop them very much.

Mr. SIMS. That might be true, but this corporation law asked for is general, and does not provide that they shall do anything with the land they buy except to sell it again. It is clear that the object of these corporations is purely speculative, for the purpose of buying and selling real estate for a profit, and syndicates do enough of that here now. They certainly get in the way of the Government enough, and now if we are going to organize corporations innumerable—and you can not limit them—evil effects will surely come. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, under this act a corporation organized in the District of Columbia would, unless it was restricted by some State legislation, be entitled to do business in any other State in the Union.

Mr. SIMS. I think so.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. And no State can affirmatively authorize such corporations to act in the District of Columbia.

Mr. PALMER. Yes; no State can authorize anybody to act in the District of Columbia, but inasmuch as all the corporations are in the States by the comity of States, no State would be inclined to prohibit this legislation going into effect or to prohibit any corporation organized under it from doing business in a State, so that in every State in the Union this most vicious legislation would take effect unless prohibited by some positive law.

Mr. OLCOTT. Unquestionably these same corporations would have the same power as foreign corporations.

Mr. PALMER. But States do not organize individuals into corporations for the purposes that they could be organized for under this bill.

Mr. OLCOTT. Practically every State in the Union allows incorporation for the purpose of buying and selling real estate.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Does the gentleman from New York recognize any difference between land titles and land interests in the national capital and the District of Columbia and any other State in the Union?

Mr. OLCOTT. Not as far as individual holdings are concerned; no.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Does not the gentleman think we ought to guard the holdings in this District more zealously than we would in an ordinary industrial community where the Government is not so largely interested?

Mr. OLCOTT. I think that anything we can do that will enable the people employed in the public service, the people of modest means, to own their own houses is advantageous. I think allowing corporations of the character to be formed for the purpose of improving outlying places and building individual houses is of benefit to the United States and is of benefit to the District of Columbia and a benefit to the residents of the District of Columbia.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That is not the purpose of this act.

Mr. OLCOTT. The purpose of this act is to allow people to form corporations to build houses and own real estate.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. And hold real estate.

Mr. OLCOTT. And hold it, if you choose.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That is one of the things I object to.

Mr. OLCOTT. And, as a matter of fact, the experience of all of these real estate corporations, certainly in the city of New York, where I come from, especially in the Bronx and in Brooklyn, has been that the main desire of these corporations has been to build small houses, because in building a hundred houses of a similar character they can build them vastly cheaper, proportionately, than a person can build one. They sell these houses to the people who can not build them themselves, who do not know how to build them, and they benefit the poorer people to a degree that has been positively marvelous in Brooklyn and the Bronx.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Well, that is true in industrial communities, but this city, its growth, beauty, and attractiveness is a matter of concern to the people of the whole country.

Mr. OLCOTT. It is true also of communities like the District of Columbia, where there are many clerks employed at a small salary.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. But it has not been true as to this capital. This capital has found its way to its present proud position against the organized opposition of real estate speculators, whose national pride is limited to a few paltry dollars, regardless of architectural beauty or civic pride.

Mr. OLCOTT. The power and opposition of half-a-million dollar corporations, that can borrow only $250,000, that could work against the interests of the United States, is a fetich which the gentleman from Michigan knows is not fair.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the figure on the top of the Capitol faces east, because it was supposed that the city would grow in that direction upon the high land above the Potomac, whereas it went west because the land was held by speculators, who might, if this law had been upon the statute books, have bought the entire District, 10 miles square.

Mr. OLCOTT. I have heard many stories relative to the speculation in land by real estate men in the early part of this century, but I do not understand that there is any such serious speculation as is suggested by the gentleman now.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, under this bill any three persons may lawfully conduct or form a corporation——

Mr. OLCOTT. So they can now, except that they can not buy and sell real estate.

Mr. PALMER. Under this bill you could have a corporation carry on a restaurant or saloon.

Mr. OLCOTT. So they can now; this bill does not affect that.

Mr. PALMER. It does affect it.

Mr. OLCOTT. Any three persons can form a corporation to conduct business that any individual can in the District of Columbia, except to buy and sell real estate.

Mr. PALMER. There are very few States in the Union where a corporation exists or can be formed to do business such as this bill gives authority to do.

Mr. OLCOTT. The gentleman must be in error about that.

Mr. PALMER. I am not in error about it.

Mr. OLCOTT. I do not think there is a State in the Union where people can not band together to form a corporation for carrying on business as individuals can.

Mr. PALMER. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. OLCOTT. It is so in New York.

Mr. PALMER. But New York is not the whole United States.

Mr. OLCOTT. I understand that.

Mr. PALMER. There are forty-four other States in the Union.

Mr. OLCOTT. Oh, I understand that. But the District of Columbia has had on its statute books a law authorizing the formation of corporations, allowing people to band together and conduct any business except the buying and selling of real estate. We are seeking to amend that statute and enable real estate to be dealt in as freely and with as little difficulty as anything else can be dealt in.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. OLCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I want to state that by the law of Pennsylvania corporations can buy and sell real estate and hold it to a limit of $30,000,000.

Mr. OLCOTT. And Alabama $10,000,000.

Mr. BENNET of New York. And that is the State Mr. PALMER comes from. To-day a corporation can organize in the State of New Jersey under their very liberal laws and come down here to the District of Columbia without any restrictions whatever and buy and sell real estate and lease it.

Mr. SHERLEY. And the answer to the gentleman is, Prevent these corporations that are created for the sake of preying on everybody except the State that creates them from doing business here.

Mr. BENNET of New York. This legislation does not affect that one way or another.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; it simply gives that right to citizens here, and having given that right to your own citizens the citizens of any State can under the Constitution demand that right.

Mr. BENNET of New York. You can not to-day bar them out.

Mr. SHERLEY. Do you mean to say we could not to-day, in the District of Columbia, prohibit corporations from doing business in real estate?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I mean to say corporations in the District of Columbia are to-day doing real estate business.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the gentleman does not answer the question. I am asking him if it is within the power of Congress to prohibit them if it saw fit.

Mr. BENNET of New York. You could not make it retroactive.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course not, and the suggestion of the gentleman does not reach the case. I do not speak in regard to property they now hold, but as to the right of corporations to do business in the future. In regard to real estate in the District of Columbia, I maintain that this Congress could, if it saw fit, prohibit corporations from trading in real estate, buying and selling, etc.

Mr. BENNET of New York. If it prohibited corporations organized here from doing that, it could in the future prohibit foreign corporations from doing what it prohibited domestic corporations from doing.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, if it permitted domestic corporations to do a real estate business it could not prohibit a foreign corporation from doing that kind of business. Is not that true?

Mr. BENNET of New York. The question of the gentleman's legal proposition is this, as I understand it: We can prohibit foreign corporations from doing anything in the District of Columbia which we prohibit domestic corporations from doing.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, I want to state the converse. If you permit domestic corporations, then you are bound to give the same privilege to foreign corporations.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Assuming that to be correct, which I do not deny, that does not affect the existing situation at all. We to-day permit foreign corporations to buy, sell, and lease real estate in the District of Columbia.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. It is a mere passive permission.

Mr. BENNET of New York. This bill before the House does not affect it in the slightest, and if it passes we give the people of the District of Columbia the same rights that citizens elsewhere have, to organize corporations to deal in and improve real estate in the District of Columbia in which they live, and it seems to me American citizens ought to have that right.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusets. You can accomplish that equality by defeating this bill and repealing the law which permits foreign corporations to do business here.

Mr. PERKINS. What is the difference between a foreign corporation holding real estate and an individual living, for instance, in New York City?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. When the individual dies the real estate is distributed.

Mr. PERKINS. The trouble is, when the individual dies it is tied up and generally it is impossible to sell the land.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. On the contrary, it is not impossible to sell it.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. PERKINS. The land has to be partitioned.

Mr. SIMS. I have two minutes remaining. I reserved the balance of my time for the purpose of moving to lay the bill on the table. I will not do that if it is objected to, of course.

Mr. BABCOCK. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. Who has the floor at the present time?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to occupy about a minute and a half on this subject before the motion is made to lay the bill on the table.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me this is a very simple proposition, and that some gentlemen have attempted to make a mountain out of a molehill. For more than twenty-five years I have been in business in my own State of Wisconsin and have handled real estate all over that Commonwealth. Our statutes were taken from New York and were the statutes of many other States in the Union. I have been a member there of perhaps half a dozen different corporations engaged in manufacturing lumber, in manufacturing flour, and engaged in other interests, and each and every one could buy and sell all the real estate they could pay for. There was no limit.

But here in the District of Columbia the committee finds what? That if you want to buy or sell real estate—if any three gentlemen want to get together and go into the real-estate business—rent houses, build houses, or improve the city—what can they do? They can not form a corporation and handle real estate. They can not do it, but they can go to Baltimore, or they can go to New York, or they can go to Virginia or Wisconsin, and form the corporation there and come here in the District of Columbia and buy and sell all the real estate they want or can pay for. And yet you propose to deny to the people of the District of Columbia the same right to handle real estate as a corporate body that practically the citizens of every other State have.

Why, we have limited the capital and indebtedness in this bill, Mr. Speaker, and provide that the capital shall not exceed $500,000. They can not buy much real estate in the District of Columbia for $500,000. We have provided further that the liability shall not exceed $250,000. Under these conditions they certainly can not corner the real estate in the District.

Mr. KENNEDY of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. KENNEDY of Ohio. I would like to ask the gentleman why that limit was put on?

Mr. BABCOCK. That is beyond my ability to answer.

Mr. KENNEDY of Ohio. I mean the limit of $500,000?

Mr. BABCOCK. The limit was put on at the suggestion of a member of the committee to provide for competition and against any corner in real estate, and prevent a real estate company with large capital from organizing and controlling all the real estate, keeping it so honest so that Members like the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KENNEDY] and myself, when we come here and buy a little house, are not obliged to pay two prices for it.

Mr. KENNEDY of Ohio. Would it not be true that the passage of this bill would open the door to the unlimited coming of corporations here so that we could not close it, and that we had better not pass this bill?

Mr. BABCOCK. They can come in here now; they can organize in Illinois and in practically any of the States in the Union and come here, and we can not control them at all. Now, we have simply presented a bill providing that citizens of the District of Columbia may organize a limited corporation to buy, sell, improve, and rent real estate. It is a legitimate proposition, and it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the opposition to this measure is that there will be something wrong about the corporation with a half a million of dollars of capital. Why, in portions of the city you can only buy single lots for half a million dollars. One lot——

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. You can not do——

Mr. BABCOCK. You paid that for the municipal building lot, namely, a half a million of dollars.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Now, you limit the holding of this corporation, but you do not limit the number of corporations that may be organized?

Mr. BABCOCK. Oh, no.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The limitation you place does not reach the spot.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would like to ask this question: Does not the gentleman think that the District of Columbia requires a different rule than that in regard to a State? You ought to promote the material development of the States, but I doubt if anyone wants the District to be promoted in a commercial sense. We want to keep it simply as the seat of government.

Mr. BABCOCK. Why, Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman I want to say that I dictated a letter of three pages yesterday in answer—Mr. Speaker, can we have order?

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. PRINCE. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BABCOCK. Let me answer this question first.

Mr. PRINCE. I beg your pardon.

Mr. BABCOCK. I want to say to the gentleman that I do not see any material difference between Washington and Baltimore. But I want to say that I, a day or two since, answered a letter from a distinguished citizen of the District of Columbia in reference to a movement that has recently been initiated to make Washington a manufacturing city—to raise smokestacks in every block, and have iron mills, steel mills, rolling mills, and industries of that kind in the capital city.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. We have log-rolling mills here now. [Laughter.]

Mr. BABCOCK. I stated to the gentleman, if the people of the District of Columbia wanted to go into a scheme of that kind, that, in my opinion, Congress would reverse its policy of making the city of Washington the most beautiful city of residences and homes in the world. Now, there is one object of manufacturing institutions coming here, and I want to mention it now. I have been officially informed, or intelligently informed, if the manufacturing institutions come here into the District of Columbia they will be away from the conditions of strikes and labor organizations that they would have in the States.

What have you done here? Gentlemen, you have gone to work, and now there is in process of distribution more than $50,000,000 to be expended in great marble and white granite buildings, the most beautiful on earth; and yet we are met here with a proposition to develop manufactures, and bring in smokestacks and everything that goes with them. Why, we would have to change our laws in the District, we would have to change all conditions, practically, of citizenship, if you mean to furnish plants of that kind that we have in the cities of Milwaukee, St. Louis, and in Detroit and cities of that class throughout the United States.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Is there any provision in this bill which would prevent one of these real estate corporations from selling land to a manufacturing corporation?

Mr. BABCOCK. I do not think there is anything in this bill that prohibits any citizen doing what he has a right to do under the law.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, I think I understood the gentleman to say that Illinois had a law that would permit people to buy and sell real estate under a corporate act. Permit me to say that Illinois has no such law. Our statute forbids a corporation buying and selling real estate.

Mr. BABCOCK. Possibly there may be no statute in the State of Illinois of that kind now, but I want to say to the gentleman that I have been a stockholder in Illinois in a corporation, and they bought and sold real estate; and it was a manufacturing corporation. That was some two years ago, and the law may have been changed since then. That was in the city of Chicago, and perhaps the city of Chicago is exempt from the operation of the law that other parts of the State would be subject to.

Mr. PRINCE. If you bought real estate other than for purposes of the manufactory——

Mr. BABCOCK. This was a general manufacturing institution.

Mr. PRINCE. That is a company, and you have to have ground to build it on; but if that corporation or any other should buy blocks of property in the city of Chicago for the sole and express purpose of holding the title of it for speculative purposes, that is forbidden by the law.

Mr. BABCOCK. That is a proposition that does not appear in the transaction. Now, if a gentleman has a manufacturing institution that goes to work and buys ground you do not have to define and put on record your purpose and what you are going to do with it. You may intend to build a plant on it. You may fail to negotiate your bonds, and then will have to sell your lot. Then you become a dealer in real estate instead of a manufacturer.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope this bill will pass. It is legitimate, proper, and a business method. I ask for a vote.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I would like to ask the parliamentary status of this bill. I see it is a Senate bill, and the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin is to put it upon its passage.

Mr. SIMS. I desire to move to lay the bill on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman at this time has not the floor for this purpose. The gentleman from Wisconsin has six minutes remaining.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. After the motion to place this bill upon its passage is made, then will it be in order to move to strike out the enacting clause or lay this bill on the table? It is a Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the first motion that it would be natural to make would be for the gentleman from Wisconsin to move the previous question. Then it would be in order under the rule for the gentleman to move that the bill lie on the table, and that motion would first be disposed of.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I first give notice that we wish to make that motion.

The SPEAKER. Or if the gentleman from Wisconsin does not move the previous question, then any gentleman could be recognized to make any motion that is in order under the rules.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, my only desire is to bring the House to a vote on this bill. In asking for a vote I mean it as a motion to concur. Now, on that I move the previous question. That will bring it to a vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. SIMS. And I move to lay the bill on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the bill do lie upon the table.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that he was in doubt; and on a division there were—ayes 50, noes 34.

Accordingly the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

AUTOMOBILES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask consideration of the bill (H. R. 16384) regulating the speed of automobiles in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no person shall drive or propel, or cause to be driven or propelled, any automobile, horseless or motor vehicle, bicycle, or horse-drawn vehicle within the fire limits of the District of Columbia, as said fire limits are now defined or may hereafter be defined from time to time in and by the building regulations of said District, upon any street, avenue, alley, or public highway at a greater rate of speed than 12 miles an hour between intersecting streets and avenues; nor across streets on which there are no railroad or street railway tracks at a greater speed than 8 miles an hour; nor at a greater rate of speed than 5 miles an hour across any intersecting streets or avenues on which there are railroad or street railway tracks; nor at a greater rate of speed than 4 miles an hour around the corners of any street or avenue; nor at a greater rate of speed than 4 miles an hour on the east side of Fifteenth street NW., between the south building line of G street and the south curb line of New York avenue; nor on the west side of Fifteenth street NW. between the line which would be the south building line of G street if extended to the west side of Fifteenth street and from said extended line north to the north curb line of Pennsylvania avenue; nor at the intersection of Ninth and F streets NW., between the building lines of the said streets; nor at the intersection of Ninth and G streets NW. between the building lines of said streets; nor at the intersection of Eleventh and F streets NW. between the building lines of the said streets; nor at the intersection of Eleventh and G streets NW. between the building lines of the said streets; nor on any public roadway, street, avenue, or alley within said District outside of said fire limits at a greater rate of speed than 15 miles an hour; and said vehicles shall at all times be under the control of the driver or operator; and the driver or operator and the owner or proprietor riding thereon or therein violating any of the provisions hereof shall, upon conviction for the first offense, be fined not less than $5 nor more than $50, and shall, upon conviction for the second offense within one year from the commission of the first offense, be fined not less than $10 nor more than $100, or imprisoned for not less than five days nor more than thirty days, at the discretion of the court; and shall, upon conviction for the third offense within one year from the commission of the first offense, be fined not less than $50 nor more than $250, or, at the discretion of the court, be imprisoned in the workhouse for not less than thirty days nor more than six months.

SEC. 2. That prosecutions for violation of the provisions of this act shall be on information filed in the police court of the District of Columbia by the corporation counsel or any of his assistants.

SEC. 3. That this act shall not be held to take away the authority of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make police regulations not inconsistent herewith.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill will be considered as engrossed, read a third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I wish to make a few inquiries about this bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I sympathize entirely with the purpose of this bill, and yet I think the committee will agree that when the purpose of a bill is, as this is, simply to provide punishment by imprisonment instead of by fine, we want to be very sure that we are not imposing unreasonable obligations. Now, I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if he thinks it is reasonable to provide, as this bill does on page 2, line 3, that no automobile or horse and wagon shall go around any corner at a greater speed than 4 miles an hour? That, Mr. Speaker, is the rate at which a man can walk. Why, if you take a cab at the railroad station, to ride home, you go at a greater speed than 4 miles an hour around the corners, and you do not want them to stop and walk every time they reach a corner. It seems to me that is an unreasonable proposition, and I should like to offer an amendment to change that 4 miles an hour to 6 miles an hour.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, I will say that the limit of 4 miles an hour going around corners is not new. That is the present police regulation, and has been for three years or longer; and I think it is one of the most necessary and vital parts of the bill, because there is greater danger of taking life or maiming by a great, heavy, 60-horsepower automobile dashing around a corner at 6 miles an hour, or any speed greater than this, than could possibly be by a carriage or horse-drawn vehicle. This law applies to both, because the Commissioners have so recommended; but an automobile turning a corner can not be seen in many cases until it is too late. The fact is that two automobiles might collide. This is the present regulation which has the force of law, and it is well known and is no surprise to any owner of an automobile or other vehicle in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman says this is the law, of course he has not in mind the difference between fine and imprisonment. It is the present regulation, but it does not punish by imprisonment. Now, in the police regulations adopted by the District Commissioners, a violation of which is punished by fine, it may be appropriate that there should be such a provision, that it should be more stringent than necessary; but in enacting that regulation into law and providing for the punishment of it by imprisonment you do not want to make it more extreme than is reasonable. The police regulation, which is punishable by a fine, can be enforced with leniency; but when you provide imprisonment you want to be moderate and reasonable.

In answer to what the gentleman has said, I say that a vehicle going around the corner at a rate of 6 miles an hour is not dangerous. I have run an automobile for years, although I do not know as I can popularly be called an "automobilist," as I never have succeeded in hitting even a chicken, but I can run around the corner more safely with an automobile than you can with a horse and carriage. The automobile is a great deal more under your control, and you can steer a great deal closer. I very gladly welcome this change of the law which substitutes imprisonment for fine, because I recognize that there are some reckless men that ought to be punished, but the great majority of them are not, and when you come to make a law punishing by imprisonment you want it so reasonable that it ought to be enforced.

I think the House must admit that it is not an unreasonable rate of speed to go around corners at the rate of 6 miles an hour, and it is unreasonable to say that a man shall be punished by imprisonment for going around a corner at a faster rate than 4 miles an hour. You do not want to compel a horse to come down to a walk, and you do not want your automobile to slow down to the slow clutch, which this generally requires.

Mr. SIMS. I wish to state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that imprisonment is only for the second and third offense, and then only at the discretion of the court.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. But the gentleman knows that neither the horsemen nor automobilists will obey this law. The gentleman does not expect that the driver of a horse will slow down his horse to a walk every time he goes around a corner. I do not object to its remaining in the Code, where it is only punishable by fine. It seems to me that the gentleman ought to be willing to accept the amendment and substitute 6 miles an hour for 4 miles an hour around a corner.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, as there may be other questions asked about the bill, I will make a general explanation and then refer to what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] has said. This bill contains the present police regulations with the exception of crossing a street at a rate of 8 miles an hour where there are neither street cars nor steam railways. This is the only change in the speed limit. Four miles an hour around corners——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow an interruption right there?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. That will remain the same, whether the bill goes through or not.

Mr. SIMS. Unless the Commissioners desire to change it, yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not if we pass this law.

Mr. SIMS. Then they can not increase it and make it any greater. Now, these regulations have been in force, as I remember, about three years. Everybody is perfectly familiar with them, and I must admit a little surprise that my friend from Massachusetts, who is an automobilist, has been operating a machine here for three years and does not know that he has always been required to go around a corner at no greater speed than 4 miles an hour.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. The gentleman does not catch my point. I do know it; and I say no matter if it is in the code, nobody lives up to it. The gentleman knows that, and he does not expect them to, and he only wants it in case of some accident that may happen, and then he can hold them by it. But when you come to punish a man by imprisonment, that is a different thing.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman now admits that he knows it. Does the gentleman expect to try to get the police regulation modified so as to make it 6 miles an hour?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. No; I do not.

Mr. SIMS. Well, the gentleman is willing to violate the law and run the risk of being made to pay for it. I think that is the best reason on earth why the law should be passed. The gentleman may be willing to violate the police regulations when he is only punished by a fine, but when punished by imprisonment we may be able to secure an enforcement of this regulation.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman think it is dangerous to allow a horse to go around a corner faster than 4 miles an hour?

Mr. SIMS. The distinguished Commissioners and the chief of police and the police officers have established these regulations as the result of experience and observation, and are what they would regard as proper and reasonable. My judgment would stand as nothing against them. And if it was not their judgment, I think they ought not to go around corners at a greater speed than 4 miles an hour.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. The gentleman does not wish to state his own opinion?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I say if it would strengthen them any they should have my opinion in addition to their own, warranted by experience. It is true there is no law that provides for anything except punishment by fine in the District of Columbia. As shown by the report of the District Commissioners last year, there were cases of violation of the law by the same person as often as four times within one year, as often as three times by the same individual, and quite a number as often as twice. The great majority of people of the District of Columbia who own automobiles and carriages do not violate the present regulations, but those who do prove themselves a menace to life and limb. There certainly should be a law passed authorizing the judges, after repeated offenses, to inflict imprisonment. It is obedience to the law that we want and not simply the collection of fines. I desire to state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that this law is mild; that it is not at all drastic when compared to some of the laws on the same subject in the different States. I suppose that in the State of New York there are more automobiles, perhaps, in use than in any other State in the Union, and I desire to say to the gentleman that, according to the report of the Commissioners of the District filed herewith, the punishment in the State of New York is, for the first offense, not over $100; for the second offense, $50 to $100 or imprisonment not exceeding thirty days, and for the third offense $100 to $250 and imprisonment not exceeding thirty days.

The State of New York, with its great experience, makes the third offense punishable by both fine and mandatory imprisonment. There is no leaving it to the discretion of the court; whereas in this bill, by reason of the advice of the Commissioners, we leave it discretionary, for they believe that the possibility of imprisonment hanging over an offender will prevent repeated violations. All I desire, speaking for myself, is that the speed limitations in the District of Columbia be observed, and that we do not punish any person more than necessary to bring about obedience to the law. I believe that mandatory imprisonment for the third offense within twelve months is reasonable and just, and might be necessary to enforce the law, but the Commissioners believe otherwise, and I am willing to have them try it, and this law, I think, is absolutely demanded. I dislike to refer to matters of which I only have personal knowledge, but since the introduction of this bill the letters I have received on the subject have been of great number. Many have spoken to me personally whom I did not know knew me, and who have advocated the law and who are owners of automobiles. I have only found one gentleman, and he a Member of this House, who said that he thought it was too drastic, but he is making no fight against the bill. These beautiful streets and pavements, the prettiest in the world, are inviting to the pedestrian and inviting to the horse-drawn vehicle, but because of the recklessness of a few people, of a few individuals, the entire city has been made, at least in a measure, dangerous to pedestrians and to horse-drawn vehicles. It is a matter that I do not have to discuss in the House; there is not a Member of the House who has been for twelve months in the city of Washington who will not make a good witness of the necessity of some kind of law. Some autoists seem to think that the streets are made for them and for nobody else. When they come to a crossing they do not slow down. They blow a horn to scatter the pedestrians and run over them if they do not get out of the way. It is shown that by the mechanical contrivance of these machines they are easily stopped. It certainly is and ought to be the duty of any self-respecting lady or gentleman to stop the machine instead of making old and young flee for their lives

Now, the Commissioners recommend this bill. They think they can enforce it, that it is practical, that it is reasonable, and before introducing any bill I consulted with the chief of police here and told him I did not want any sensation out of this, that all I wanted was only what the necessity of the case required. If there is anything wrong with the bill, it is that it is too mild in its provisions, and for the third offense, as in the State of New York, there ought to be mandatory imprisonment. The present speed limits are well known to the people and we do not take them by surprise by creating new speed regulations.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take up the time of the House further, unless some gentleman wishes to ask some question concerning the bill which I think I can answer. As to the 4-mile limit around corners, that is the very best part of existing regulations, and the very best part of this bill.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I yield.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. As I said before, Mr. Speaker, I sympathize with the general purpose of the bill. I agree that a great many automobilists are reckless, and I would be glad to see them punished, but I do not think on that account we ought to pass a bill which is unreasonable. The gentleman says it is unreasonable to go around a street corner with a horse and wagon or an automobile at a rate exceeding 4 miles an hour. I wish to submit to the judgment of this House whether it is or not. I venture to say that the Members of the House do not believe that and that they will say that for an ordinary wagon to go around a corner at 6 miles an hour or for an automobile, for that matter, is not unreasonable, and is not dangerous. Therefore I wish to offer that amendment, to change four to six, and I move that in line 3, on page 2, to substitute for the word "four" the word "six."

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I want to say in reference to this bill that the gentleman from Tennessee is the father of the proposition. He has taken a great many chances in coming here to the Capitol mornings to attend committee meetings at 10 o'clock and half past 10 o'clock, dodging corners with automobiles coming around at 4 miles an hour, and he has come up here with a bandana handkerchief wiping the perspiration off his brow and stating he had been chased by an automobile. The committee has appreciated the difficulties that he has labored under in getting to the Capitol, and for that reason, Mr. Speaker, we have made a favorable report on this bill and have reduced the speed down to 4 miles an hour, just about the gait the gentleman from Tennessee tells me that he can dodge in good shape. [Laughter.]

Now, if you go to work and make this 6 miles an hour, he is going to be in the same shape that he was before and we are liable to lose one of the most distinguished members of the District Committee. I really hope, Mr. Speaker, that this 6-mile-an-hour amendment will not be carried just on that account. Now, I am free to say I think I can dodge a 6-mile-an-hour automobile going around a corner if you give me time, but when it is coming right around the corner or across a track I might not want to have it go over 4 miles, and, out of deference and respect to the gentleman from Tennessee, I do hope the House will vote this amendment down and not put him in the position of having a 60-horsepower machine, with loud-blowing horn, coming at him around a corner under a 6-mile-an-hour rate of speed. I think it is wrong. I ask that this amendment be voted down.

Mr. SIMS. I just want to say a word. I do not want any Member of this House to vote for or against the amendment on my account. I admit that I am not a good dodger; not as good as the gentleman from Wisconsin [laughter], but I am willing to take my chances, because there are several others, perhaps, who are not as good dodgers as the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, on page 2, line 3, I move to strike out the word "four" and insert the word "six."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 3, after the word "than," strike out the word "four" and insert in lieu thereof the word "six."

The question was taken; and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts) there were—ayes 20, noes 57.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me? After that vote I do not suppose there is a possibility of any amendment, reasonable or otherwise, being adopted, but, at the same time, my opinion may be wrong, and there is another suggestion in this bill which I think out to be amended and I am going to offer it.

It says in line 18 that no horseless vehicle or automobile shall travel outside the District fire limits at a greater rate of speed than 15 miles an hour. That means out on the Conduit road or out on Fourteenth street an automobile shall not go faster than 15 miles an hour, or if a man has a horse which can go a three-minute gait he shall not be allowed to speed him. It seems to me that is unreasonable. I recognize that there ought to be some limit. I recognize that when any other vehicle is in the way you ought to slow down. I offer this amendment, that on any public road within said District outside of the fire limits it shall not go at more than 12 miles an hour when meeting or passing a person or vehicle. That limits it; that when any other vehicle or person is in the road they shall slow down the automobile or horse to 12 miles an hour, but if you have got a clear stretch of road there is no reason you should not let your horse or automobile out, and therefore I offer an amendment in line 20, page 2, to strike out the words "15 miles an hour" and substitute in lieu thereof the words "12 miles an hour when meeting or passing a vehicle or person."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 20, amend by striking out the words "15 miles an hour" and inserting in lieu thereof "12 miles an hour when meeting or passing any other vehicle or person."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words about that. Of course I am not so much interested in the District of Columbia beyond the fire limits, because my observation is not extensive. This is the present bill's regulation—namely, 15 miles an hour beyond the fire limits. This, of course, if it had not been found necessary would not have been made. When you get beyond the fire limits you have got to turn corners, you have got to go around bends of the road, and the District Commissioners do not think the speed ought to be greater than 15 miles after you pass the fire limits. I do not think we ought to adopt this amendment without knowing more about it than we do.

Mr. BABCOCK. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. BABCOCK. I suppose that so far as the gentleman from Tennessee is concerned he is not personally interested in the speed on the Conduit road?

Mr. SIMS. I am not personally acquainted with it.

Mr. BABCOCK. The gentleman does not travel that road every morning as he does the road to the Capitol?

Mr. SIMS. That is it.

Mr. BABCOCK. Does the gentleman further understand that if he takes off the speed limit entirely you can go 100 miles an hour under the other limit?

Mr. SIMS. I understood the gentleman to say it was 12 miles an hour.

Mr. BABCOCK. Twelve miles an hour when passing another vehicle.

Mr. SIMS. I misunderstood the amendment. Then, Mr. Speaker, it is only the more objectionable. I do not think it ought to be done, and I do not think it necessary to discuss it further.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I can not see what objection there is to letting a horse or an automobile go as fast as you please when you have got the road all to yourself. I would like to know what objection the gentleman can see to that? If there is no other vehicle in the road, why would you not let your horse or vehicle out?

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, that means the bill here just reported by the committee as a substitute?

Mr. BABCOCK. What is it?

Mr. SIMS. The bill passed is the bill H. R. 16384, instead of the original bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. It is the substitute reported by the committee.

LONG BRIDGE.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 14897, and after the Clerk reads the title of the bill I would like to make a statement before making the usual motion.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14897) providing for the temporary maintenance of the Long Bridge over the Potomac River, and for other purposes.

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, this bill should be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BABCOCK. I wish to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. It is on the Union Calendar, but the gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to make a statement about it at this time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to the House that some years ago Congress appropriated money to build a new highway bridge across the Potomac just above the Long Bridge. Previous to this time the Long Bridge had been occupied, and for many years, by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, the Mount Vernon Electric Railway Company, and used by the public for general travel and traffic. The new bridge itself was completed a short time since and thrown open to the public. The bridge—the iron structure—is 2,600 feet long, the approach on the Virginia side is 2,200 feet long, the approach on the Washington side is 1,250 feet long, making the bridge and the approaches something over 6,000 feet long. The War Department, the Commissioners, and especially the people of Virginia, appealed to the Committee on the District of Columbia to keep the old Long Bridge open for traffic on account of the unfinished condition of the approaches to the new bridge. That, in other words, the embankments were so soft that they would not bear the heavy traffic of the brick wagons—and practically all the brick used in Washington comes from Virginia. The committee, after considering the bill at several meetings, finally formulated a bill which provides that the old Long Bridge shall be turned over to and operated and maintained by the District government until the 15th day of next December, when it shall be removed by the Pennsylvania Railroad. Under the contract that the Pennsylvania road has with the Government, it is obliged to remove the bridge now, inasmuch as it has ceased to use it, and they are under no obligation to maintain the bridge, but by request they are maintaining it temporarily until Congress shall determine what course to pursue.

Now, the difficulty, Mr. Speaker, of using the new highway bridge, which, however, is now being used by the Mount Vernon electric road and brings to the District a revenue of about $8,000 a year for passengers that cross the bridge in its cars, is on account of the condition of the approaches. The fill on the Virginia side, 2,200 feet long, nearly half a mile, has not settled sufficiently to permit granite block pavement being permanently put on; and all say the approaches will not stand the traffic of wagons loaded with brick coming from Virginia.

The committee, in its wisdom, attached to this bill a paragraph specifying that after the 1st of June all wagons weighing, when loaded, more than 2 tons, should be equipped with wheels having tires not less than 4 inches in width. The brick interests, or the representatives of the brick companies, came to me personally and stated that the provision for 4-inch tires was agreeable to them, and that they were in favor of it and believed it should be done to protect the roads. Now, the tires that are in use as a rule are 2 inches wide. The committee supposed when they reported the bill that they were doing something in the interest of the city of Washington and the interest of all concerned, and that 4-inch tires would protect the streets and highways and save the District of Columbia a large sum annually in street repairs. But, I am sorry to say, I have been presented with letters and petitions, which I have here, proving by their statements that a vehicle with a tire 2 inches in width, bearing a load of 3, 4, or 5 tons, will not do a pavement as much harm as a 4-inch tire. Of course it is an entirely new proposition to me, and possibly if the committee will wait a little longer they will be convinced that a tire an inch wide will answer the purpose better than a 4-inch tire. Now, here are petitions and letters from business men, contractors, paving companies, and one from the Brennan Construction Company, from which I wish to read an extract to show how ignorant Congress has been on this subject:

It is a well-known fact to men in the paving business that diversified travel is essential for the life of an asphalt pavement, and where there is no travel the asphalt will, within two or three years, disintegrate.

As evidence of this an asphalt pavement laid on Tunlaw road, where there never is any travel, has completely disintegrated.

Mr. Speaker, the statements presented here would indicate that the narrower the tire and the heavier the load the better it will be for the condition of the streets.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this petition is a request for a hearing on that portion of this bill which provides for 4-inch tires, and I submit it, so far as I am personally concerned, to the House, and I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee, who desires, I believe, to make a motion.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, in view of what the gentleman from Wisconsin said, which seems to be the view of the committee, I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF SNOW AND ICE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask consideration of the bill H. R. 14582.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14582) for the removal of snow and ice from the paved sidewalks of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the tenant or occupant of any building or lot of land, or in case there shall be no tenant or occupant, the owner of any building or lot of land fronting or abutting on any paved sidewalk within the fire limits of the District of Columbia, and in the case of any building or lot of land owned by any corporation, joint stock company, or syndicate, the superintendent, manager, or other person in charge or control of such building or lot of land, shall, within the first four hours of daylight after the ceasing to fall of any snow, cause the same to be removed from such sidewalk; and in case ice has formed upon such sidewalk, the tenant, occupant, owner, superintendent, manager, or other person in charge or control of such building or lot of land, as above set forth, shall, within the first four hours of daylight, after the same has formed, cause the same to be sprinkled with ashes, or some other suitable substance. Any violation of any of the provisions of this act shall subject the person so offending to a fine of not more than $5, or, in default of the payment of such fine, to imprisonment in the workhouse of the District of Columbia for not more than five days.

SEC. 2. That in the event the owner or owners of any building or lot of land mentioned in the preceding section of this act be a nonresident or nonresidents of the District of Columbia, and there be no tenant or occupant of the same, and the requirements of the preceding section of this act are not complied with, or if such building or lot of land be owned by any nonresident corporation, joint stock company, or syndicate, and the superintendent, manager, or other person in charge or control thereof shall fail to comply with the requirements of the said preceding section of this act, or if there be no such superintendent or other person in charge or control of such building or lot of land so owned by any nonresident corporation, joint stock company, or syndicate and the requirements of the preceding section of this act are not complied with, it shall be the duty of the Commissioners of said District in every such case to cause the snow or ice to be removed, or to cause the same to be sprinkled as mentioned in said preceding section of this act, and for every such removal or sprinkling by them they shall assess the sum of 3 cents per front foot against each such lot, and, in the case of corner lots, an additional charge of 3 cents per running foot for the depth of the property abutting on the intersecting street, and every such assessment so levied for removal by said Commissioners of such snow or ice, or the sprinkling as herein provided shall be a lien on said lot of land, and shall become due and payable and be collected as general taxes on real estate in said District are due, payable, and collectible.

Mr. BABCOCK. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KLINE], who reported the bill.

Mr. KLINE. Mr. Speaker, this bill (H. R. 14582) contemplates legislation to regulate the removal of snow and the accumulations of ice from the sidewalks in the District of Columbia, and to punish those who may offend against the provisions thereof. It may seem strange and possibly surprising to the membership of this House that there is no existing law or enforceable regulation to compel the property owners in the District of Columbia, or their tenants, to clear the sidewalks in front or along their property of snow or ice. In all northern cities where the vigors and inclemencies of snow and ice prevail there are regulations for the removal of the snow and the accumulations of ice.

Congress has previously attempted to legislate on this subject, but hitherto was unable to place on the statute book a law which could stand the scrutiny and judicial interpretation of the appellate courts on constitutional grounds. The laws heretofore passed were prominent for their absence of uniformity, equality, and for their want of discriminations between those property owners which were intended to be reached by the contemplated legislation. On March 2, 1895, Congress passed an act for the removal of snow and ice from the sidewalks, cross walks, and gutters in the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and for other purposes, which act was declared to be insufficient; and again, on March 2, 1897, Congress passed another act on the same lines for the same purposes. That act was declared unconstitutional in the case of Holtzman v. United States (14 App. D. C., 454), in which it was held by the court "as to the special feature that differentiated it from the act of 1895, that it was unconstitutional, null, and void," and at the same time pointed out various crudities, inconsistencies, and inequalities that tended to descredit it in its entirety. Nothing further was done to enact this class of legislation from 1897 until February 10, 1904, when an act on the same subject was passed by this House, which, in the case of McGuire v. The District of Columbia, reported in 24 Appeal Cases, D. C., page 22, was also declared unconstitutional and void, as imposing unequal burdens upon and discriminating between citizens similarly situated and equally entitled to bear the same burden. In the latter cited case the court also laid down the rule that "the prime requisite of such legislation is that it should be uniform and capable of universal enforcement."

It thereupon dawned upon the minds of the District Commissioners that they, under some old power conferred upon them, were empowered to pass or promulgate a regulation by which the tenants and occupants of property along the several sidewalks could be compelled to remove snow and ice. They did promulgate such a regulation, and the matter was immediately taken before the courts of the District, and it was again declared, in Coughlin v. District of Columbia, a case reported in 25 Appeal Cases, D. C., page 251, that the District Commissioners were not empowered with such authority, and that their act was null and void.

In my judgment, this is a duty which should be imposed upon the property owners of the District, and that the municipality should not be charged with this burden.

The Commissioners, in a communication directed to the chairman of the District Committee on this subject and the impracticability of forcing the municipality to do this work, said this:

Any measure which proposes the removal of snow and ice by the municipality, with the cost thereof assessed against abutting property, presents almost insuperable obstacles, owing to the fact that there are 550 miles of paved sidewalks within the fire limits of the District of Columbia, equaling 2,904,000 linear feet. It is estimated that under ordinary conditions, with an average depth of snow of 6 inches and with a ridge in the center of the sidewalk packed down by pedestrians, one man could clean 30 feet of walk and open the gutter in one hour. In an eight-hour day this would require 12,100 men and cost, at $1.50 each per day, an aggregate of $18,150, a sum which would reach fully $20,000 when tools, supervision of gangs, etc., are taken into consideration.

Mr. Speaker, the removal of snow and ice is a duty or obligation which the property owner should perform. He should do it without protest or compulsion. The Washington property owner has so many privileges, advantages, and exemptions of onerous burdens that this burden of removing snow and ice should be cheerfully borne by him. If this burden is to be placed on the municipality at the expense of the Government, by the sanction of the citizens or direction of the court, I should not be much surprised some day to hear that Congress be asked to exempt the citizens of the District of Columbia of many other obligations which they are required to bear at this time.

That Congress has been unable heretofore to pass a law that was enabled to stand the interpretation of the courts is, in my judgment, no credit to the wisdom and judicial acumen of the solons of either House of Congress.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will it interfere with the gentleman's argument if I ask him a question or two?

Mr. KLINE. Not at all.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am somewhat interested in the law question involved in this bill, and am also interested that there should be proper care taken of the streets and walks of this city. This bill, as I understand it, makes it a misdemeanor for a property owner to fail to remove snow and ice from the walks in front of his premises.

Mr. KLINE. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does the gentleman know of a case or an instance in this country where the courts have upheld legislation of that kind? The theory, I think, generally is that the care of the public streets and walks is a public charge, and while for special reasons construction and maintenance of walks may be charged against the adjoining property owner, my recollection is that in every instance where an attempt has been made to impose a penalty on the property owner for his failure to perform that duty the courts have set aside the law and declared it to be invalid. Does the gentleman know of a single instance in this country where such a law has been upheld in a court of last resort?

Mr. KLINE. I can not cite any particular instance or case at this time. I know that such a law has been upheld by the subordinate courts in Pennsylvania. I could not state whether the question was ever taken to the appellate courts of that State or not.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. My impression is that the courts have uniformly declared such laws invalid, because it is not within the constitutional power of the legislature to impose a duty of this kind upon an individual, a duty that is essentially public, and to enforce its performance by a penalty.

While I should like to see proper legislation to protect the public against bad sidewalks, I fear that this bill, if enacted into law, will be set aside by the courts at the first opportunity.

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. I can give the gentleman some information on that subject.

Mr. KLINE. I was just going to say that this bill provides that the party offending may be punished by summary proceedings. On page 2 of the bill it is provided that any violation of any of the provisions of this act shall subject the person so offending to a fine of not more than $5, or, in default of the payment of such fine, to imprisonment in the workhouse of the District of Columbia for not more than five days.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. My friend from New Jersey [Mr. WILEY] tells me that he knows of instances where such legislation has been upheld.

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. That law is in force in New Jersey—in Essex County, where I live.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. By a criminal process?

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. I do not think they have waited for that.

Mr. KLINE. Do I understand the gentleman from New Jersey—that legislation of this character has been upheld by the courts of New Jersey?

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. The legislation is in force, and has been for years. I know it, because I was an executor of an estate and fined $5 because the man did not clean the snow off from the walk, and I had to pay it.

Mr. KLINE. On the other hand, I know that courts have been known to reverse themselves and sometimes in a few instances did not know the law themselves. I will not venture to say that the present bill will be construed to be constitutional and enforceable. It is an improvement on former bills on the same subject. It was prepared by the Commissioners, considered by the subcommittee and the general Committee on the District of Columbia in the light of judicial criticism on the subject and in the light of the authorities which I have cited in the course of my remarks. I say it is not certain that the courts will uphold the law, but the Commissioners are anxious to exhaust all means of securing an effective ice and snow law before they are compelled to appeal to Congress for an appropriation.

I ask that said bill be passed without amendment.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

AMERICAN HOMEOPATHIC INSTITUTE FOR DRUG PROVING.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 12904) to incorporate the American Homeopathic Institute for Drug Proving.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill to incorporate the American Institute for Drug Proving.

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-named persons, to wit, J. B. Gregg Custis, of Washington, D. C.; George Royal, of Des Moines, Iowa; Charles Mohr, of Philadelphia, Pa.; Willis A. Dewey, of Ann Arbor, Mich.; Benjamin F. Bailey, of Lincoln, Nebr.; John P. Sutherland, of Boston, Mass., and Edwin H. Wolcott, of Rochester, N. Y., their associates and successors, duly chosen, are hereby incorporated and declared to be a body corporate by the name of the American Institute for Drug Proving, and by that name it shall be known and have perpetual succession.

SEC. 2. That the objects of the corporation shall be—

(a) To study the effects of drugs upon animals and healthy persons and to preserve a record of such experiments and the results thereof in such form and manner as shall make them available and useful in the treatment and cure of disease.

(b) To disseminate the knowledge of the results of such experiments by lecture, printed documents, or otherwise, as may be deemed best.

(c) To purchase such property, real and personal, and to provide and maintain or aid in the equipment of such laboratories as may be necessary to carry on the work of the corporation.

(d) In general to do and perform all things necessary to promote the objects of the institute.

SEC. 3. That the direction and management of the affairs of the corporation and the control and disposal of its property and funds shall be vested in a board of trustees, seven in number, to be composed of the following individuals, to wit: J. B. Gregg Custis, George Royal, Charles Mohr, Willis A. Dewey, Benjamin F. Bailey, John P. Sutherland, and Edwin H. Wolcott, who shall constitute the first board of trustees and who shall hold office until their successors in office shall be chosen, as may be provided by the by-laws of said corporation. The board of trustees shall have power from time to time to increase its membership to not more that fifteen members: Provided always, That a majority of the board of trustees shall be composed of members of the American Institute of Homeopathy. Vacancies occasioned by death, resignation, or otherwise shall be filled by the remaining trustees in such manner as the by-laws shall prescribe, and the persons so elected shall thereupon become trustees and also members of the said corporation. The principal executive offices and repository for the records of said corporation shall be located in the city of Washington, D. C.

SEC. 4. That such board of trustees shall have full power from time to time to adopt a common seal, to appoint such officers, members of the board of trustees or otherwise, and such employees as may be deemed necessary in the carrying out of the objects of the corporation, at such salaries or with such remuneration as they may deem proper, and with full power to adopt by-laws from time to time and such rules and regulations as they may deem necessary to secure the convenient transaction of the business of the corporation, with full power and discretion to deal with and expend the income or funds of the corporation in such manner as in their judgment will best promote the objects herein set forth, and in general to have and use all the powers and authority necessary to promote such objects. Said corporation shall report annually the result of its scientific experiments and its receipts and expenditures to the American Institute of Homeopathy.

SEC. 5. That the said corporation may take and hold donations, grants, devises, and bequests which may be made to it in support of the said corporation.

SEC. 6. That as soon as may be possible after the passage of this act a meeting of the trustees hereinbefore named shall be called by the said J. B. Gregg Custis, George Royal, Charles Mohr, Willis A. Dewey, Benjamin F. Bailey, John P. Sutherland, and Edwin H. Wolcott, or any three of them, at the city of Washington, D. C., by notice served in person or by mail to each trustee at his place of residence, and the said trustees, or a majority of them, being assembled, shall organize and proceed to adopt by-laws, to elect officers, and appoint committees, and generally to organize said corporation, and thereafter the board of trustees shall once a year, or oftener at their election, meet in the said city of Washington, or elsewhere as they may by resolution of the board or by the consent in writing of a majority of the board determine, such consent in writing to be recorded, together with the names of the trustees giving such consent, in the records of the corporation.

SEC. 7. That Congress may from time to time alter, repeal, or modify this act of incorporation, but no contract or individual right, made or acquired, shall thereby be divested or impaired.

SEC. 8. That this act shall take effect immediately.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 3, line 17, after the word "discretion," insert the words "in said board."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to incorporate the American Homeopathic Institute for Drug Proving."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know something about this bill before action is taken on it.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I will yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WILEY].

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced by request. I am not a homeopath and therefore it is an act of great magnanimity on my part. It is a benevolent organization with a view to obtaining contributions and using them for the purposes stated in the bill and to report the results for the benefit of humanity generally.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to know what this provision means: "To study the effects of drugs upon animals and healthy persons and to preserve a record of such experiments." I will call attention to several provisions in the bill, as it may be that the gentleman will explain them all.

This act of incorporation is different from every other one the District Committee has reported. Heretofore it has made these corporations corporations in the District of Columbia, but there is no such restriction in this bill. More than that, there is a provision on page 3, at the bottom of the page, that I would like the gentleman to explain, in which this corporation is required to report the result of these scientific experiments, its receipts and expenditures, to the American Institute for Homeopathy. What branch of the Government is that and what right has the Government or why should Congress incorporate a drug-proving concern and direct it to report to some other institution, philanthropic or otherwise? I hope the gentleman will make a full explanation of this bill.

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. I think the language of the bill is sufficiently clear. I do not see what explanation the gentleman wants, but——

Mr. GARRETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. What powers are given to this institution by incorporation here that it could not obtain by incorporation under the general statutes of the District?

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. That is a legal question, and as I am not a lawyer I will allow the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. KLINE, to answer it.

Mr. GARRETT. Would there be any objection to inserting, in line 10, after the word "corporate," the words "of the District of Columbia?"

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. No objection whatever.

Mr. GARRETT. I think unquestionably that ought to be done. I do not think this institution after being incorporated would have any legal standing if these words were not inserted so as to create it a corporation of the District of Columbia. That the Congress can create a corporation for the purpose of carrying out any of the delegated powers of Congress is perhaps not now to be questioned, but that the Congress can create a corporation for performing any work or engaging in any business that is not for the purpose of carrying out some one of the expressly delegated powers seems to me to be beyond the scope of constitutional power. I take it there is no doubt, however, of the power of Congress to create a corporation in the District of Columbia, though I do doubt the policy of these special acts. I do not think they ought to pass at all. The provisions of the general law are full and ample, and there is danger in these special acts.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will offer an amendment, we will accept it. The committee has no pride in this matter whatever.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I offer that amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield for that purpose?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire a vote upon his amendment at this time?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, at any time that it is in order. I understood the committee would accept the amendment, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH] saying there was no objection to it. If the bill must pass, though I hope it will not, that provision should certainly be in it. I hope, however, that whether so amended or not the bill will not pass.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will put the question now. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, at some time I would like a chance to interrogate the gentleman who is in charge of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Certainly, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is there not a general law by which anybody in the District of Columbia who desires to be incorporated can apply to some established authority and secure an incorporation, as one can in the State from which the gentleman comes or in the State from which I come?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I understand that these gentlemen do not consider that the present law in the District is sufficient for them to incorporate in the manner in which they desire to be incorporated.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to have a minute or two. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, several times I have suggested to the House a plan which seems to me to be in the interest of transacting the public business, and that is that we have on hand three sorts of business to which we devote a great deal of time, with which we ought not to have anything to do at all. One of them is respecting private claims. There ought to be some kind of a tribunal to which these private claims can be referred. I take it that nearly every man in the House would make a fairly good trial judge, if he were elected or appointed a trial judge, and if it were his business to hear evidence in a case he would give a fairly correct decision; but what is everybody's business is nobody's business. Sometimes we spend two or three hours here, 386 of us, passing on a claim of less than $100, and nobody, except the particular member of the Committee on Claims who passed on that claim, knows anything about it. The proceeding is ridiculous. In the second place, we ought to get rid of private pension bills. The pension laws, if they are not sufficiently liberal now, ought to be liberalized so that we may get rid of the business to which I refer. All the old soldiers ought to stand on the same plane and be treated impartially. In the third place, we ought to get rid of this entire batch of District of Columbia business. With all due respect to everybody connected with it, I say that it is a nuisance in this House. It is not a very violent presumption that any Member of this House or member of the United States Senate would be competent to sit in the common council for the city of Washington, if he lived here and were familiar with facts and environments; but we come here one day out of every two weeks and we must either follow the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] or some of his lieutenants on faith, or we have to fight them on faith. So far as I am concerned, I generally vote against them on faith. [Laughter.] Now, we ought to be getting rid of this business instead of enlarging it. What is happening here? I will tell you exactly. Everybody in the District of Columbia who wants a corporation created, instead of going to the authority in the District which has power to incorporate, as I presume it has——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman right there?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I do not know how this bill ever got into the hands of the Committee on the District of Columbia anyway, because it is incorporating a lot of people who do not even live here.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, there is no question about there being power under the general statutes to create corporations of this kind.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the gentleman mean by Congress or by somebody in the District of Columbia?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. By somebody in the District of Columbia. Authority already exists. We had a bill up for consideration not an hour ago to amend that law, and it is sufficiently broad in its terms to include this kind of corporations, but this institution or association, like a great many others, desires to get the prestige of incorporation by special act of Congress.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I do not think that is quite true, because these people could not be incorporated under the laws of the District and ought not to be incorporated by act of Congress. They are not residents of the District.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not think the laws require them to be residents.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, I do not care much about this particular bill one way or another; I have no prejudice against anybody connected with it; but I want to explain to the House what we are coming to. Now, on the last District of Columbia day, two weeks ago, we spent nearly the whole day jowering about corporations here in the District of Columbia. If we go on a month or two longer granting these incorporations by acts of Congress everybody who wants to be incorporated in the District of Columbia, instead of going down here to get an incorporation in the proper and legal manner, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] says they can, will be here applying for incorporation. I will tell you why. As he said, it gives prestige to the corporation.

Now, we had one for the Daughters of the Revolution. Everybody wants to be pleasant with the women. Then we had one to incorporate the Eastern Star, and two brethren here fell foul of each other—one was a Mason and the other was not a Mason, and the thing seemed to go off on that. I am a thirty-second-degree Mason. There is only one degree higher, and I can not get that unless I devote most of my time to the work of the order, which I am not going to do. These institutions were incorporated as a matter of sympathy and sentiment. The other day some very estimable ladies sent for me to come out and see about incorporating an educational institution to operate in the country generally. I asked them what was the reason they did not go down to the District of Columbia building and go to the proper authorities and get the incorporation. They said very frankly they wanted the prestige of a Congressional bill. Now, this bill comes up and it is proposed to incorporate a drug company. If you can incorporate a drug company—of course, I do not care anything about what school of medicine it is, one way or the other—but if we are going into the business of incorporating drug companies to give them prestige, why not go into the business of incorporating a grocery company to give it prestige over other competing grocery companies in the District of Columbia? Why not pass a bill here incorporating some particular shoe house or a particular dry-goods store? In England I understand the fact to be—I have never been over there—that certain men carry on their cards and on their signs "Hatters to the King." You have been over there——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And "Haberdashers to the King" and "Wine merchants to the King," and half of them never sold the King a hat or a quart of wine or any haberdashery at all. What they want is the prestige that the sign gives them. They pay for it, as the gentleman near me [Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts] suggests. It is for mere advertising purposes over there, and that is what all of these incorporations are desiring here, a mere matter of advertisement for the concerns which are incorporated; and if we go into this business I give you fair warning now, instead of having one District day every two weeks you will have to have one District day every week, and this is as good a time as we are ever going to have to stop it now—that is, to beat this bill without any reference as to who it is who wants to be incorporated or what it is except it is a drug bill. [Applause.]

Mr. KLINE. Has the gentleman from Missouri any opposition to the features of this bill?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not know whether I have or not.

Mr. KLINE. I will inform the gentleman this corporation could not be incorporated under the general law——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then change the general law.

Mr. KLINE. Well, we have not come to that yet, because the majority of these incorporators are not residents of the District of Columbia.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why did they not go to New Jersey to get incorporated? That is the great home of corporations.

Mr. KLINE. I do not know; but they have chosen this forum.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Can not they get proxies under the law?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know how we settled this corporation business in Missouri about getting incorporation papers. The legislature passed a general law and took it out of the hands of the legislature. Up to that time it was "Pull Dick, pull devil," as to who would get incorporation bills passed by the Missouri legislature. At last they passed a general law authorizing the circuit court to issue incorporation papers in certain cases and the secretary of state to issue them in others, and charged them to inquire into the character and business of the parties who were seeking incorporation for the purposes of a corporation. Since that we have had no trouble about incorporating companies. I repeat that I have no prejudice whatever against the estimable persons asking by this bill for incorporation. I am simply and steadfastly opposed to Congress going into the general incorporating business.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. My recollection is that the statute governing corporations in the District of Columbia does not require the stockholders nor all of the directors to be residents of the District. It requires some of the directors and perhaps the main office to be in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I think, if the gentleman will permit me to say so, it requires at least three of them to be residents of the District of Columbia. Why should a lot of strangers come here, over whom this District government has no jurisdiction, and be incorporated under the District law? It ought to be under general law, it ought to be by the citizens of the State where it is incorporated, and there ought to be some restrictions and limitations in the general law thrown around these corporations that come in here like a newborn jaybird.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is true that in some of the States they require some of the directors to be residents of the State authorizing the incorporation, and to maintain the principal office in the State, so as to bring the corporation under the jurisdiction of the courts, and I think that is the provision in the District of Columbia. Now, the State of New Jersey does not require a stockholder or a director or a member of a corporation to reside in the State of New Jersey, but it does require the appointment of a resident agent, upon whom civil process may be served; but I think the general laws here cover this class of corporations. If they do not you can change the provision as to incorporators and include two or three who reside in the District. I agree with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] that the time has come to vote down this class of corporations. I do not think there is any public need for granting special charters by act of Congress.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana if there is anything in the proposed corporations requiring that they should have a charter in any State or Territory anywhere in the world?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not know that there is.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. They desire it, as my colleague has said, because it gives them the grandiloquence of a special Federal charter and without any limitations whatever. Every corporation ought to have some limitation thrown around it. These special corporations appear here in the twinkling of an eye, without the consideration of anybody except the committee from which they come, with no sort of limitations, with no sort of restrictions, no sort of control, and I have protested as they have been presented from various committees in this House that Congress ought not to go into the business of granting special charters to special corporations in any instance.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am unable to determine whether the character of the corporation desired to be created is scientific, humanitarian, or commercial. I think it is a combination of the three.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I think it is. I will say in this connection while I have the floor, although not entitled to it, there is another objection to having the Congress give charters of this kind. It is not to transact business within the District of Columbia. These Federal corporations will go into all of the States and do business. Probably they would not be subject to State taxation, and certainly not subject to State control. So here we are instituting a series of corporations to go into the States and do business, sitting over and above and beyond the power of the State to control or regulate or tax them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this is a private bill, and the committee has no jurisdiction of the same.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I do not think the gentleman from Michigan will question the point.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Let me say to the gentleman I think we can dispose of the matter in just a moment if he will allow it to go to a vote.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will ask that the bill be laid upon the table, I will withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair takes it for granted that the gentleman's point of order is that it is a private bill; that the committee has no jurisdiction of the bill, and it should be recommitted with a view to giving it proper reference. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman to the status of the bill now. That point of order, if it could be considered at all, would have to be considered, in the opinion of the Chair, before the House had entered upon its consideration. So the Chair is not required to rule whether it is a private bill or not. Whether it be proper or not, the committee has been considering it for thirty minutes, and the Chair for that reason——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will move that the bill be laid on the table at the proper time. I simply wish time to call attention to some of the provisions of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Michigan, having the floor, yields it for that purpose?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I only wish the gentleman would allow us to take a vote upon the bill, and I call for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, has there been a motion to lay the bill on the table?

The SPEAKER. No.

The question was taken on the engrossment for a third reading; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move that the bill lie on the table.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 51.

The SPEAKER. Pending that motion, the Chair desires to lay before the House, if there be no objection, the following message from the President of the United States.

SITTINGS OF THE UNITED STATES COURTS AT MIAMI, FLA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without approval, House bill No. 10080, for the reasons set forth in the following letter from the Acting Attorney-General:

"I have the honor to reply to your communication of March 8, asking that you be informed whether I know of any objection to the approval of the inclosed bill—H. R. 10080, entitled 'An act to provide for sittings of the United States circuit and district courts of the southern district of Florida at the city of Miami, in said district.'

"Replying to a request from the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate for information showing the desirableness or otherwise of the proposed legislation, I advised them:

"'Terms of court are now held in said district at Tampa, Jacksonville, Key West, and Fernandina. From information obtained in the examination of accounts of court officials for said district it appears that very little business arises in the vicinity of Miami, and that there is no real necessity for terms of court at that place in addition to terms at the other places above mentioned.'

"Further consideration confirms the opinion that there is nothing to demand a term of court at that place. It will entail considerable expense on the Government, and the public interest will not be subserved thereby.

"The proviso in the bill 'that suitable rooms and accommodations shall be furnished for the holding of said court at said place, free of expense to the Government of the United States,' is objectionable. If a term of court is needed it should not depend on whether accommodations therefor are gratuitously supplied. Conditions of this character appear to me to conflict with the public interests; and they are used, of course, in many cases to secure the passage of bills which should not otherwise command adequate support.

"I am of the opinion that the bill ought not to become law."

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 12, 1906.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill and message be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

OPIUM TRAFFIC IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs, and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the information of Congress, the report of the committee appointed by the Philippine Commission to investigate the use of opium and the traffic therein, and the rules, ordinances, and laws regulating such use and traffic in Japan, Formosa, Shanghai, Hongkong, Saigon, Singapore, Burma, Java, and the Philippine Islands.

I also inclose a letter from the Secretary of War, submitting the report for transmission.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 12, 1906.

SAMOAN CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State concerning this Government's obligation to pay to that of France the sum of $3,391.13, under the convention between the United States, Germany, and Great Britain, for the settlement of Samoan claims, signed at Washington on November 7, 1899.

Prompt action should be taken to discharge this obligation.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 12, 1906.

The message, with accompanying documents, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I withhold my motion in order that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] may be recognized.

GOVERNMENT HOSPITAL FOR THE INSANE.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which I send to the Clerk's desk, being the bill (H. R. 15643) to authorize the board of visitors of the Government Hospital for the Insane to summon and examine witnesses under oath, and making it a misdemeanor for any such witness to refuse to attend or testify or produce books or papers when summoned.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill has already been read at a previous session.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, this is the bill to which I objected the other day when it first came up. I no longer desire to object, but the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] has several amendments that he desires to offer to the bill; and if there be no objection, I should like to have his amendments read and considered en gross.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, while I shall not oppose the amendments, I prefer that they be considered separately.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Florida rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendments which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out of line 1, page 2, the word "secretary" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "president."

Mr. GROSVENOR. I see no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out of lines 1 and 2 the words "or any member thereof."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on that amendment?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is all right. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out, in line 11, on page 2, the word "relating" and by inserting, after the words "shown to be in his custody or control," "relevant."

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the word "both," in line 15, on page 2, the following:

"That any person or persons, or association of persons, making or preferring charges of any kind against the management of such Government Hospital for the Insane, or against any officer or officers, or against any employee of attaché thereof, shall have the right to attend at all times the investigation of the same and to be attended and represented by counsel, and by such counsel to examine and cross-examine any and all witnesses who may testify as to the subject-matter of the charges preferred, and to have summoned by said Board of Visitors such witness or witnesses as such counsel may designate, and to have produced such books or papers as such counsel may call for, relevant to the subject-matter of the investigation; and that all matters included in such charges shall be inquired into, unless admitted by the person or persons charged, or waived by the person or persons preferring the same."

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of section 1 the following:

"Provided, That all such investigations shall be public and shall be conducted at some suitable place in the city of Washington—unless, when an examination of the conditions of the hospital premises are being conducted—to be designated by the Secretary of the Interior; and all testimony taken shall be reduced to writing and transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Interior at the session of Congress next held after the completion of such investigation; that the proceedings shall be governed, so far as possible, by the ordinary rules of evidence, and where answers are refused upon ground that the questions are irrelevant, incompetent, or immaterial, they shall be certified to the chief justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia for his decision, as is the practice in equity causes in said District.

"Provided further, That a majority of said board of visitors shall be in attendance at all of such investigations; that no person directly or indirectly involved or affected by any charge or charges made the subject-matter of such investigation shall act as an officer or member of such board of visitors during such investigation, and that no employee or inmate of said Government Hospital for the Insane shall be in any way prejudiced by any testimony he or she may give during any such investigation."

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the reprint of the bill (H. R. 15346) to apply a portion of the proceeds of the public lands to the State normal schools of the United States for the advancement of instruction in agriculture.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent for the reprint of the bill which he refers to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

JUVENILE COURT, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 51) to create a juvenile court in and for the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HINSHAW in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 51) to create a juvenile court in and for the District of Columbia, and the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I think it would save time and I move to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, this bill was passed by the Senate in December last. The only amendment that has been made to the Senate bill is the one made by the committee repealing all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with this act and fixing a definite time when this law shall go into operation. That was overlooked in the draft of the original bill.

The bill provides for a separate court, specially officered, having jurisdiction over crimes and offenses of persons under 17 years of age committed against the United States in the District of Columbia, as well as against the District itself. It gives the juvenile court sole jurisdiction in all cases of delinquent and dependent children, and provides for the punishment of adults who aid and abet delinquency in a child. It gives to the court the control of admission to all juvenile reformatories or asylums supported wholly or in part by Congressional appropriation, as well as parole or transfer therefrom.

In drawing this bill those who are interested in this matter tried to avoid all experimental features and only included such provisions as have been demonstrated by experience to be practical in other States where similar courts are in operation. Washington for some reason is the only large city in this country which has no definite provision for the formation of character of juveniles. Juvenile courts are in existence in a great number of cities of the country and in nearly every State. The most noticeable development in the last five years has been in the introduction and establishment of these courts. They began in Chicago in 1899 and are now in existence in nearly every city and State. The juvenile court has proven to be a life-saving institution, and its true function is educational. It has been demonstrated that the juvenile court has already passed beyond the stage of experiment and is accomplishing substantial results, and that it is an economical as well as modern method of caring for delinquent and dependent children. One authority has said that no child should be punished for the purpose of making an example of him, but the idea of the judge should be that of formation and not reformation. The parental authority of the State should be exercised instead of the criminal power.

By this bill it is intended that the care and custody and discipline of the child may approximate as nearly as possible that which should be given by its parents and only as a last resort the child is placed in a reformatory institution. One of the most important things provided for is the probation system or the parole system—so that the judge may in every case, if he sees fit, put the child on probation and under parole under the direction and supervision of his probation officers. To give an illustration of how thoroughly the criminal power has been superceded by the parental authority of the States where similar laws are in operation, I have in this report statistics from fifteen of the largest cities in the country, which show that for two years prior to the introduction of those courts in those cities there were 6,052 children incarcerated in jail, whereas since the law was put in operation there have been only about 1,200 children incarcerated, or about one-sixth as many as were incarcerated before such laws were put in operation.

It is now the exception in most jurisdictions to have a child committed to jail. Statistics show that the number of commitments to reformatories and other institutions have greatly decreased, and in every possible case the child is placed in an approved home under the control and supervision of the probation officers. The only expense provided for is the salary of the judge, clerk, and the probation officers—the judge at $3,000 a year, a clerk at $2,000 a year, and the probation officers, one at $1,500 and the other at $900 a year. Juvenile courts are economical in that they save the cost of maintaining thousands of children in public institutions, and with these small items the cost ought not to have much consideration at the hands of this House. There have been in Washington for the year ending June 30, 1905, 1,762 children charged with offenses which will now come under the jurisdiction of the juvenile court if this bill becomes a law. It is quite evident that the time of one judge, his clerk, and his assistants would be well taken up in handling this sort of cases.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman whether it would not be possible for one of the present presiding judges to act as the juvenile judge?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. It might be possible, but it is not advisable. We have discussed and investigated that question, and we find here that the police judges of this District are working all of their time, and even after court hours, when they endeavor to hold a sort of juvenile court without any legal authority particularly, and they can not be successfully conducted. The great feature of this juvenile court procedure, and the underlying principle, is to divorce the child from a criminal procedure. We do not want to bring the child into the criminal or the police courts, because they are demoralizing in their atmosphere. We want to take them out of that atmosphere, and I believe it is right they should be taken out of it.

Mr. MADDEN. The point I wanted to make is this: That where this character of proceeding was first instituted was in Chicago——

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And there one of the judges required is assigned to the trial of cases of this character, and we find that it is no hardship on the court or its time to designate one of the judges to do this sort of work. We were not obliged to create a special court for that purpose.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Is it not true that that judge who has been designated as a juvenile-court judge in Chicago devotes his whole time to the juvenile court?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I have been informed that he does.

Mr. MADDEN. He only devotes one day in a week, not to exceed two days in any week.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. With the statistics before me—and we can not expect children to grow any better in anticipation of this law—it would seem that this one man is compelled to look after, try, and arrange for the future of 1,762 children in a year; his whole time will be taken up if he attends to his business and proposes to do any good. For that reason we advocate the creation of this office at the very reasonable salary of $3,000 a year.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question for information.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is the minimum age in the District of Columbia at which a person can be sent to the penitentiary for felony?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I think 16 years; but I am not certain about that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, where does this new judge's jurisdiction begin as to age, and where does it end?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. It begins at any age, and ends with 17.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is there any appeal from his decision at all?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes; an appeal is provided for in section 22 of the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Who has been discharging the duties that it is proposed to assign to this juvenile judge heretofore?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. The police magistrates, in large part.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. On page 6, lines 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12, I find this language:

And no child once committed to any public institution by the order of the juvenile court shall be discharged or paroled therefrom or transferred to another institution without the consent and approval of said court.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That seems like cutting off the chance of a review by any other court.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. It is not so intended. The idea of that is the juvenile-court judge, having studied this case out and decided where to place the child, should not be disturbed by outside jurisdiction in his control of the child as long as the child is in the probationary period. I will say to the gentleman that I wrote to several gentlemen interested in this work in reference to this very portion of the bill which has just been read, and each one of them urged that that should remain in the bill. It was the custom in other States, and although at first I thought it was rather a harsh and arbitrary provision, I believe now, from their explanation, it is proper, because whoever may be selected as juvenile judge is supposed to be a man of sound judgment, which he will exercise in dealing with the children brought before him.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of course that would be the presumption, and the chances are that would be the case, and yet you never can tell what kind of an influence unlimited power is going to have on a man's mind. Now, it is stated as a historical fact that Robespierre when he was a young man resigned the position of criminal judge because he would not pass sentence of death on one man, and yet he lived long enough so he could order 300 to death before breakfast without a qualm of conscience. Now, it seems to me there ought to be some chance for one of these juvenile offenders to reform, and as soon as he reforms to get him out of the tutelage of this judge of the juvenile court.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. As soon as ever he reforms the judge is supposed to release him from under his jurisdiction.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But suppose you happen to get a judge who seemed to think that nobody would ever reform?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Then that would be a very unfortunate position, and we have to rely upon the appointing power, which is the President of the United States, to select a man who will not be of such character. Now, the offenses which come under this jurisdiction would, of course, primarily be under police jurisdiction.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me ask a couple more questions. How long a term has this judge?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Six years.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is there any machinery for removing him?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I do not think the bill provides any machinery. He serves six years. I presume the judge, like any other judge, is subject to impeachment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But impeachment proves to be an absolute and total failure. They never convicted but one man on impeachment, and he was crazy.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. There is nothing in the bill providing for removal of the judge. It provides for removal of the clerk, who is to be appointed at the pleasure of the judge, and——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think there should be a provision in there in regard to the removal of the judge.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. If there are no further questions, Mr. Chairman, I ask to have the bill read for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill by paragraph.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I might say, Mr. Chairman, that unless there is some one who desires to offer an amendment to the bill we do not——

Mr. MADDEN. I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, there ought to be a provision in the bill authorizing the removal of the judge for cause by the appointing power.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman request the reading of that portion of the bill?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. What amendment have you?

Mr. MADDEN. I suggest an amendment providing for the removal of the judge for cause by the President.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I have no objection to the amendment coming in after where it says, "who shall be appointed by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate. What language would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. MADDEN. You can make any language you suggest.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. What is your point?

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to have the language made so the judge may be removed by the President for cause.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Then, after the words "United States" you would insert "subject to removal for cause."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 8, after the words "United States," insert "subject to removal for cause."

Mr. CLAYTON. Subject to removal for cause, by whom? Ought you not to say "by the President?"

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I will accept the suggestion, and add the word "President."

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, line 8, after the words "United States," add "subject to removal by the President for cause."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, if there are no further amendments, I move that the committee rise and report the bill back to the House with amendments, with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would rather have the bill read, so that we can get at it. I do not know that I will object to anything in it, except that which has been amended, but it is a very important matter to turn all of the children in the District of Columbia over to the tutelage and care of one man, I do not care a straw who he is.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection having been made, the bill will be read by the Clerk by paragraphs.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That in cases of sickness, absence, disability, expiration of term of service, or death of the judge of the juvenile court, any one of the justices of the supreme court of the District of Columbia may designate one of the justices of the peace to discharge the duties of said judge of the juvenile court until such disability be removed or vacancy filled, and the justice of the peace so designated shall, before entering upon his duties as such acting judge, take the oath prescribed for judges of courts of the United States; and said acting judge shall receive $5 per day in addition to his salary as justice of the peace for the term that he shall serve, to be paid in the same manner as the salary of the judge of the juvenile court.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask a question, which I should have asked at the close of the previous section, in reference to section 2. It reads:

Said judge shall receive an annual salary of $3,000, and he shall be entitled to thirty days' leave of absence during each calendar year.

I think usually when the salary is fixed at an annual salary, it is not customary to say that if a man takes a vacation he shall take it on pay. And whether there will be any possibility of a construction that he was entitled to pay for those thirty days in addition to his annual salary, I would suggest to the gentleman in charge of the bill——

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. That was not the intention. The intention was simply to provide for $3,000 salary and allow a vacation. In some jurisdictions, when a judge takes a vacation, and especially police-court judges, the mayor or other authority appoints a temporary judge who receives the pay of the judge who is off on his vacation. I presume that language is put in the bill for that reason by the person who drew it. Any suggestion that the gentleman has that will do away with any doubt we will accept.

Mr. PERKINS. My suggestion is that it might be printed so as to read:

Said judge shall receive an annual salary of $3,000, and he shall be entitled to thirty days annual leave.

With that provision there will be no doubt that he will get the $3,000, and there will be no reduction of salary.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Could we not say, "Not to exceed $3,000," and that would save the whole trouble? Then this question of vacation would not enter into it at all.

Mr. PERKINS. That would not make any difference. It would not change it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] offer that as an amendment?

Mr. PERKINS. If it is acceptable.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, line 14, after "absence," strike out "with pay during each calendar year," and insert "without deduction from salary."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, in line 8, the language of the bill is that this judge "shall be appointed by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate." The usual and the proper language is "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. The committee accepts that amendment.

Mr. HAY. I move to amend the bill by inserting after the word "States," in line 8, the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 8 strike out the words "confirmed by" and insert the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say to the gentleman in charge of the bill that I understand him to say that the judge of this juvenile court is to be an exceptionally fine gentleman and one well versed in the law, and so forth.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. He should be.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. And he probably would be.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I certainly think he probably will be.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I notice in section 3, however, that in case of sickness, absence, or disability one of the justices of the supreme court of the District may designate a justice of the peace to discharge the duties of the judge.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes, sir. That is in case there is sickness.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Without saying anything derogatory of the justices of the peace, is the gentleman informed as to the caliber of the justices of the peace in the District of Columbia, as to their legal ability, and so forth?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I made inquiries at the time of our hearings as to the character of men who occupy these positions, and found that they are men of good character. They get $3,000 a year, and are men who would successfully fill the position, if they were called upon to do so, during the temporary absence or sickness of the regular judge.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Ordinarily justices of the peace throughout the several States are not considered to be men of eminent legal ability.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I believe that fact can be proved in many jurisdictions, and there may be some men of that kind here, but generally these men are said to be of excellent character and ability.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. If the gentleman is at all firmly convinced in his mind as to the justices of the peace being men of sufficient legal attainments and ability to fill this office, I will ask what justice of the peace the judge of the supreme court is going to appoint?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I can not answer that. I refer you to the language in the bill:

Any one of the justices of the supreme court of the District of Columbia may designate one of the justices of the peace.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Is that justice of the peace supposed to now reside here?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes; there are five or six of them, any one of whom could be designated, and they are all appointed by the President.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I would move to amend the bill by inserting after the word "peace," in line 7, page 2, the words "of said District."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 7, page 2, after the word "peace," insert the words "of said District."

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The object, I will say, Mr. Chairman, is to define the locality of the justice of the peace who is going to be designated.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I will say to the gentleman that the amendment is not necessary; but I will not object to it.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Does the gentleman from Minnesota believe that any of the justices of the supreme court of the District is going to appoint some justice of the peace of Virginia or Maryland?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. There is nothing here to prevent him.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Of course I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the said court shall also have power to appoint two discreet persons of good character as probation officers, one male and one female, and one shall be designated as chief probation officer, who shall receive an annual salary of $1,500, and the other shall be designated as assistant probation officer, who shall receive an annual salary of $900. Such probation officers shall perform such duties and be governed by such regulations as may be prescribed by the presiding judge.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill about the last sentence of section 4:

Such probation officers shall perform such duties and be governed by such regulations as may be prescribed by the presiding judge.

How do you come to devolve that duty, the power and duty of prescribing the duties of these probation officers?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. The probation officers are obligated to look after the welfare and conduct of such children as have been put upon probation by the judge. As they have to report to him, he is to make such regulations for the conduct of the officers themselves in looking after these children.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What are they supposed to do, in a general way?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. In a general way they are supposed to go out and look over the situation. When a complaint comes to the judge as to a delinquent or dependent child they are to prepare his case for him. If the court finds the child is delinquent and decides that it has to be taken care of they are supposed to see the home provided by the court for the child is at a proper place and the persons in control exercise a good moral influence. In a general way they have general supervision over the conduct of the child so long as the probationary period shall last, and are practically guardians of the children.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to make this amendment: After the word "judge," in line 24, insert "and such presiding judge is authorized to remove said probation officers, or either of them, at any time for cause."

Now, unless that power is in the bill elsewhere, I think it better be put in there. I have not had time to examine the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I think it has not been put in the bill and I have no objection to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 24, after the word "judge," insert "and such presiding judge is authorized to remove such probation officers, or either of them, at any time for cause."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the said court shall also have power, and is hereby authorized, to defer sentence, at its discretion, in the case of any juvenile offender under the age of 17 years, and parole such child under the care of the chief probation officer for a probation period discretionary with him, and who shall cause said child to return to court at the end of such term either for sentence or dismissal. Such paroled child shall be under the jurisdiction of the juvenile court for such period and shall be subject to such reasonable rules and regulations touching the welfare of the child as may be prescribed by it. In case such paroled child shall fail to keep or shall disregard the terms of his or her parole the said court shall have full power to cause such child to be brought before it for further proceedings.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, in line 4 the word "and" ought to be stricken out before the word "who." Whoever wrote this bill seems to have been particularly stuck on putting in the word "and" at the end.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. That is correct.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 4, strike out the word "and" before the word "who."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the said court shall have power to appoint a clerk at a salary of $2,000 per annum, and who shall hold his office during the pleasure of the court.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend line 15 by striking out the word "and" at the end of the line.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That the juvenile court of the District of Columbia shall have original and exclusive jurisdiction of all crimes and offenses of persons under 17 years of age hereafter committed against the United States, not capital or otherwise infamous, and not punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, committed within the District of Columbia, except libel, conspiracy, and violations of the post-office and pension laws of the United States, and also of all offenses of persons under 17 years of age hereafter committed against the laws, ordinances, and regulations of the District of Columbia, and shall have power to examine and commit or hold to bail all persons under 17 years of age, either for trial or further examination, in all cases, whether cognizable therein or in the supreme court of the District of Columbia. Said juvenile court shall have all the powers and jurisdiction conferred by the act entitled "An act for the protection of children, and so forth," approved February 13, 1885, upon the police court of the District of Columbia, and shall also have original and exclusive jurisdiction of all cases involving the legal punishment of children under the provisions of "An act to provide for the care of dependent children in the District of Columbia and to create a Board of Children's Guardians," approved July 26, 1892 (27 Stat., p. 268), and of the acts amendatory thereof; also of all cases under the provisions of "An act to enlarge the powers of the courts of the District of Columbia in cases involving delinquent children, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1901 (31 Stat., p. 1093), and said juvenile court may hereafter, concurrently with the criminal court, have and exercise all the powers and jurisdiction conferred by said last-mentioned act upon the police court of the District of Columbia in the case of parents or guardians who shall refuse or neglect to provide food, clothing, and shelter for any child under the age of 14 years: And it is further provided, That the court may impose conditions upon any person found guilty under the said last-mentioned act, and so long as such person shall comply therewith to the satisfaction of the court the sentence imposed may be suspended, and of all cases of dependent or delinquent children cognizable under existing laws in any court of the District of Columbia, except in the cases hereinbefore already excepted; and the said juvenile court may also hear, try, and determine all cases of persons less than 17 years of age charged with habitual truancy from school, and in its discretion to commit them to the Board of Children's Guardians, who are hereby given the care and supervision thereof when so committed. No person under 17 years of age shall hereafter be placed in any institution supported wholly or in part at the public expense until the fact of delinquency or dependency has been first ascertained and declared by the said juvenile court. All children of the class now liable to be committed to the Reform School for Boys and the Reform School for Girls shall hereafter be committed by the juvenile court. All other children delinquent, neglected, or dependent (with the exceptions hereinbefore stated) shall hereafter be committed by the juvenile court to the care of the Board of Children's Guardians, either for a limited period on probation or during minority, as circumstances may require, and no child once committed to any public institution by the order of the juvenile court shall be discharged or paroled therefrom or transferred to another institution without the consent and approval of the said court.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill what is the meaning of lines 14, 15, and 16, on page 5? It does not seem to me that those words express anything in good English. I can not understand what is intended to be provided by them.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Lines 14, 15, and 16?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes. It says:

The court may impose conditions upon any person found guilty under the last-mentioned act, and so long as such person shall comply therewith to the satisfaction of the court the sentence imposed may be suspended.

That is all right. Then it says:

And of all cases of dependent or delinquent children cognizable under existing laws in any court of the District of Columbia.

There is nothing that comes in connection with that.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. The court may impose conditions in all cases of dependent and delinquent children.

Mr. PERKINS. It does not say so. It says they may impose conditions upon a person who is guilty under a certain act. If you mean "and of all cases," I think you ought to amend the wording.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. What is your suggestion?

Mr. PERKINS. I should say change the word "of," in line 14, to the word "in," so that it will read "and in all cases."

Mr. TOWNSEND. "And upon," it seems to me, is the wording which will make it agree with the others.

Mr. PERKINS. I think the word "in" is more appropriate than the word "upon."

Mr. CLAYTON. Let the Clerk report the proposed amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. I move, in line 14, to strike out the word "of" and to insert in place thereof the words "may impose similar conditions in." As it is now I do not think it makes sense.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 14, page 5, strike out the first word "of" and insert "may impose similar conditions in;" so that it will read: "and may impose similar conditions in all cases of dependent or delinquent children."

Mr. PERKINS. I think it reads all right with that amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill another question. On page 5, in line 14, are the words "dependent or delinquent children."

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And on page 6, in line 4, "delinquent, neglected, or dependent." Now, I want to know what you mean by "delinquent children?"

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. The act itself defines them, in section 9.

Mr. CLAYTON. On page 6, line 21.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio (reading)—

The term "delinquent child," or children, as used in this act, shall be held to mean and include any child who has been convicted more than once of violating any law of the United States, or any laws, ordinances, or regulations in force in the District of Columbia.

And "dependent or neglected" is defined in the first part of the section. These definitions, I am informed, are in accordance with the usual definitions in such acts.

Mr. HAY. I move to amend the bill, in line 4, page 6, after the word "court," by inserting the words "to said schools, respectively."

As the bill now reads, while it gives the juvenile court the power to commit these children, it does not say to what school they shall be committed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 6, in line 4, after the word "court" insert "to said schools, respectively."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 14. That the jury for service in said court shall consist of twelve men, who shall have the legal qualifications necessary for jurors in the supreme court of the District, and shall receive a like compensation for their services, and such jurors shall be known and selected under and in pursuance of the laws concerning the drawing and selection of jurors for service in said court. The term of service of jurors drawn for service in said juvenile court shall be for three successive monthly terms of said court, and in any case on trial at the expiration of such time until a verdict shall have been rendered or the jury shall be discharged. The said jury terms shall begin on the first Monday in January, the first Monday in April, the first Monday in July, and the first Monday in October of each year, and shall terminate, subject to the foregoing provisions, on the last Saturday of each of said jury terms. When at any term of said court it shall happen that in a pending trial no verdict shall be found, nor the jury otherwise discharged before the next succeeding term of the court, the court shall proceed with the trial by the same jury as if said term had not commenced.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question. I do not understand the bill, although it may be right. You have defined the jury terms, and you say the jury terms shall begin on the first Monday of January, etc., and shall terminate on the last Saturday of each of said jury terms. You are defining the jury terms, saying when they shall begin, and saying that they shall end on the last Saturday of the term, but when is that?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. The Saturday before the first Monday in January, April, July, and October of each year.

Mr. PERKINS. Where does it say that?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Why it says that the terms shall begin on the first Monday in January, the first Monday in April, the first Monday in July, and the first Monday in October.

Mr. PERKINS. But the term of court does not necessarily have to run three months.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I presume the object of the language is to insure three months' time.

Mr. PERKINS. It does not say so.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. What is the gentleman's suggestion?

Mr. PERKINS. Is it the idea to have a continuous term?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes, practically.

Mr. PERKINS. Then I would suggest that it read the last Saturday prior to the beginning of the following term.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I will accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words in lines 8 and 9 "of each of said jury terms" and insert in place thereof "prior to the beginning of the following term."

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I would like to hear that amendment read again.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. I would suggest also, Mr. Chairman, to strike out the word "last," in line 8, so that it will read, "On the Saturday prior to the beginning of the following term."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "last," in line 8, and the words "of each of said jury terms," in lines 8 and 9, and insert in place thereof the words "prior to the beginning of the following term."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill pass.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee determined to rise; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HINSHAW, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 51) to create a juvenile court in the District of Columbia and had directed him to report the same back with several amendments with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote desired on any amendments?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, there is one amendment that I think would be well to give a little attention to. I am not sure but that the committee got a little mixed up on it. It is the amendment to section 14, and I ask that a separate vote be had on that amendment.

The SPEAKER. A vote will be taken on all the other amendments.

The other amendments were considered and agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment to section 14.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 9, lines 8 and 9, strike out the word "last" in line 8 and the words "each of said jury terms" and insert, after "Saturday," "prior to the beginning of the following term;" so that it will read: "On the Saturday prior to the beginning of the following term."

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. What I wish to call attention to, Mr. Speaker, is that section 19 provides that said court shall hold terms on the first Monday of every month and continue the same from day to day as long as it may be necessary for the transaction of its business. Now, if the court concludes its business in one week, it then adjourns until the next term, the first Monday of the next month. And yet this provision in reference to the jury—as it stands, you will have your court in a state of adjournment and your jury in session.

That would be a very anomalous condition.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, it does not seem to me that the gentleman is quite correct in that. The court holds so long as it shall have business, and of course the gentleman will realize that business will come up from time to time. We will suppose they dispose of such business as they have, say, in the first week, and then in two or three weeks later there is some other juvenile offender brought before the court. The court would then direct the jurors to be drawn in to attend the case, as it seems to me.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. It seems to me that is correct.

Mr. PERKINS. And while the court and jury is in legal existence for the term of three months, yet when the judge is not holding court, there are no jurors there and they are not required to be there, but they are subject to the power of the court to call them in when they are required. When a man is required, if he is on the panel, he is called in, and when the court has no business he goes about his own business. It does not seem to me there would be any trouble about that.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I do not think the language is quite clear as to that. That may be the proper construction, but the language of the bill I apprehend leaves some ground for confusion.

Mr. PERKINS. I think the gentleman is right in saying that the language of the bill will leave some ground for confusion, and that on a good many questions, but it seems to me that this amendment, so far as it goes, is all right.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I simply desire to call the attention of the committee to it, because it is not in the shape I should desire to see it if I had charge of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question was taken; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 13538. An act to incorporate The Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching;

H. R. 6385. An act granting an increase of pension to Henry Hastings;

H. R. 9944. An act granting an increase of pension to Thomas J. Martin; and

H. R. 8977. An act to create a new division of the western judicial district of Texas, and to provide for terms of court at Del Rio, Tex., and for a clerk for said court, and for other purposes.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. HOAR to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Bridget P. Elliott, Fifty-ninth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the regular order.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Speaker, I submit the regular order is the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15442) to establish a Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the gentleman from Colorado desire to go on with that bill at this late hour?

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 15442) to establish a Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PRINCE. I would like to ask if the House refused to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill, if it would then be in order to take up the call of committees, which rests at the present time with the Committee on Military Affairs?

The SPEAKER. Presumably so, although the Chair can not answer definitely. The business called up by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BONYNGE] is a privileged order and is now in order. Of course, if the motion to go into Committee of the Whole be voted down and nothing else came up of similar privileged character, the gentleman demanding the regular order, being the call of committees, it would rest with the Committee on Military Affairs. The gentleman from Colorado moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I would ask unanimous consent to put a question to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BONYNGE].

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman may proceed.

Mr. BONYNGE. And pending my motion, Mr. Speaker, I would now ask if we can not make some agreement respecting the time for general debate?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I was about to ask the gentleman if he intended to take up the reading of the bill to-night, or if he would be content merely to debate it?

Mr. BONYNGE. If there is to be no further general debate I, of course, would ask to go on with the reading of the bill as far as we could.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. In view of that, Mr. Speaker, I think I ought to suggest to the gentleman that the bill is of such far-reaching importance that it ought not to be considered by a House of these slender proportions, and perhaps I would have to make some motion under those circumstances.

Mr. BONYNGE. Does the gentleman desire to debate it in general debate. There is no minority report, but if I could have an agreement with anybody who is opposed to the bill, if that is in order, I am perfectly willing to agree to some general debate, putting a limit on the time.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard on the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the House being so thin, I do not think the gentleman ought to seek to close general debate by unanimous consent.

Mr. BONYNGE. I do not seek to close it, but to put a limit upon it.

Mr. PAYNE. The debate the other day developed the fact that some gentlemen desire to be heard on different features of the bill, and I do not think we should cut off debate or close it to-night.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Speaker, it is certainly evident if there is to be any general debate, general debate would take all the time that is left for to-day, so I shall not ask for any agreement this evening, but simply make the motion to go into Committee of the Whole with the understanding that the time will be consumed altogether in general debate, and there will be no vote taken upon the sections to-night.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to suggest there are some Members present who desire to debate this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill indicated.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Upon a division (demanded by Mr. BONYNGE) there were—ayes 58, noes 26.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, following the precedent in the RECORD of March 8, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER (after counting). One hundred and thirty gentlemen are present; not a quorum.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of the Interior submitting an estimate of appropriation for fulfilling the treaty stipulations with the Seminole Indians—to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor submitting an estimate of appropriation for continuing construction of immigrant station at Angel Island, San Francisco, Cal.—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor submitting an estimate of appropriation for establishment of the Fort McHenry range lights—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, transmitting a list of useless papers on the files of his Departmnet and suitable for destruction under the law—to the Joint Select Committee on Disposition of Useless Papers, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

SURG. W. C. BRAISTED'S REPORT ON RUSSO-JAPANESE WAR.

Mr. PENROSE. Yesterday the Committee on Printing reported favorably a resolution submitted by me providing for the printing of 2,250 copies of the "Report on the Japanese naval medical and sanitary features of the Russo-Japanese war to the Surgeon-General United States Navy." The resolution was introduced by me at the suggestion of the Surgeon-General. I am informed by one of the clerks this morning that the wording of the resolution does not include printing the illustrations in the pamphlet, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that an order be made by the Senate that the illustrations in the pamphlet provided for by the resolution be included.

Mr. ALLISON. As I heard the resolution read yesterday, it is a Senate resolution. If illustrations are to be printed, I fear the cost will be over the $500 limit. If so, it should be a concurrent resolution. I merely call attention to that fact.

Mr. PENROSE. Then I will ask to have the resolution amended so as to make it a concurrent resolution.

Mr. CULLOM. First let the vote by which the resolution was passed be reconsidered.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask the Senate to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed yesterday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote is reconsidered, and the resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, when it is made in the form of a concurrent resolution, I should like to have it read.

Mr. PENROSE. I move to change the form to a concurrent resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be changed to a concurrent resolution at the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania, and, as changed, it will be read.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 2,250 copies of the "Report on the Japanese naval medical and sanitary features of the Russo-Japanese war to the Surgeon-General, United States Navy, by Surg. William C. Braisted, United States Navy," of which 1,250 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 1,000 copies for the use of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery of the Navy Department.

Mr. PENROSE. I move to insert, at the proper place, "together with the illustrations."

Mr. GALLINGER. Is there no provision in the resolution for a supply to the House of Representatives? There ought to be.

Mr. PENROSE. I suggest that a similar number of copies be also printed for the House of Representatives. It is a very interesting work, and there is very great demand for it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest to the Senator that the House, I think, will insist upon double the supply given the Senate.

Mr. PENROSE. Very well; I will increase the number, and make it read "2,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives."

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if the official who makes this report was connected with the Japanese army in any way?

Mr. PENROSE. The suggestion was made to me by the Surgeon-General in a communication addressed to me in response to an application for copies of this report. He replied that the quota was exhausted and suggested the introduction of a resolution providing for the printing of an additional number.

Mr. GALLINGER. I presume this medical officer was connected with the Japanese army in some way.

Mr. PENROSE. I am informed that he was.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it will be a very valuable document. I hope a sufficient number will be printed to supply the demand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendments submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendments were agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution as amended.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 4,750 copies of the "Report on the Japanese Naval Medical and Sanitary Features of the Russo-Japanese War to the Surgeon-General, United States Navy," by Surg. William C. Braisted, United States Navy, the same to include the illustrations, of which 1,250 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,500 copies shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 copies for the use of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery of the Navy Department.

Mr. SCOTT. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to House bill 12987. I ask that the amendment be read.

The amendment was read and ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed, as follows:

"SEC. —. That all common carriers subject to the provision of this act shall provide, at all points of connection, crossings, or intersections at grade, where it is practicable and necessary for interstate traffic, ample facilities by track connection for transferring any cars used in the regular business of their respective lines of road from their lines or tracks to those of any other common carrier whose lines or tracks may connect with, cross, or intersect their own, and shall provide equal and reasonable facilities for the interchange of cars and traffic between their respective lines, and for the receiving, forwarding, and delivery of passengers, property, and cars to and from their several lines and those of other common carriers connected therewith, and shall permit switch or short-road connections to mines and other industrial plants to connect with its line where it is practicable and necessary for the movement of interstate traffic, and shall not discriminate in their rates or charges or in the supply of cars between such connecting lines, switches, or short roads, or on freight coming over such lines, switches, or short roads; but this shall not be construed as requiring any common carrier to furnish for another common carrier, or for switch or short roads herein authorized, its tracks, equipment, or terminal facilities without reasonable compensation; that each of said connecting lines shall pay its proportionate share for the building and maintenance of such tracks and switches as may be necessary to furnish the transfer facilities required by this act, except switch and short-road connections to mines or other industrial plants shall be built and maintained at the cost of the party or parties interested in making such connections, and in case they can not agree on the amount which each line shall pay, or the right to connect said switch or short line, as hereinbefore provided, then said amount and the right to connect with the line of said common carrier shall, upon application of either party, be determined and adjusted by the Interstate Commerce Commission; and any party shall have the right to review the order of said Commission determining the right of a switch or short road to make connection, as hereinbefore provided, or in fixing the proportionate amount to be paid by each carrier, as herein provided, by filing a petition in the circuit court for the district where such transfer facilities are furnished or authorized, by serving notice in writing on the adverse party within ten days after the making and filing of such order by said Commission, and upon the service of such notice there shall be regarded as pending in said circuit court a civil action for the adjustment and determination of the amount to be paid by each carrier for the expense of the building and maintaining of the said transfer facilities or the right under this act to make connections of said switch or short road. PUBLIC BUILDING AT DENVER, COLO.

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 582) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Denver, in the State of Colorado.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments.

Mr. LODGE. How much does the bill carry?

Mr. PATTERSON. Two million three hundred thousand dollars, as proposed to be amended by the committee.

Mr. LODGE. Is that all?

Mr. PATTERSON. That is all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first amendment of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was, on page 2, line 1, after the word "million," to strike out "five" and insert "three;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States postoffice and other governmental offices in the city of Denver and State of Colorado, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, not to exceed the sum of $2,300,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 17, to strike out all of the bill down to and including line 14, on page 3, in the following words:

If, upon consideration of said report and accompanying papers, the Secretary of the Treasury shall deem further investigation necessary, he may appoint a commission of not more than three persons, one of whom shall be an officer of the Treasury Department, which commission shall also examine the said proposed sites, and such others as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate, and grant such hearings in relation thereto as they shall deem necessary; and said commission shall within thirty days after such examination make to the Secretary of the Treasury written report of their conclusion in the premises, accompanied by all statements, maps, plats, or documents taken by or submitted to them, in like manner as hereinbefore provided in regard to the proceedings of said agent of the Treasury Department; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon finally determine the location of the building to be erected.

The compensation of said commissioners shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but the same shall not exceed $6 per day and actual traveling expenses: Provided, however, That the member of said commission appointed from the Treasury Department shall be paid only his actual traveling expenses.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND IN DAKOTA COUNTY, MINN.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. Let us proceed with the Calendar in regular order.

Mr. NELSON. I trust the Senator from New Hampshire will yield to me for a minute.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield to the Senator from Minnesota, and then I shall ask for the regular order.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10101) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell and convey to the State of Minnesota a certain tract of land situated in the county of Dakota, State of Minnesota.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to sell and convey unto the State of Minnesota, under such provision as he may direct, and for such compensation as he may deem adequate, the following tract of land, which was heretofore purchased by the United States for the purpose of allotting the same to certain Sioux Indians residing in the State of Minnesota, situated in the county of Dakota, and State of Minnesota, described as follows, to wit: Southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 27, township No. 115, range 17, but the land shall not be sold at less than the appraised value.

The proceeds arising from the sale of such land shall, if the Secretary of the Interior so elect, be paid to said proposed allottees or their representatives, or lieu lands purchased for them elsewhere.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

USE OF RESERVOIR SITES.

Mr. GAMBLE. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he will yield to me to call up a bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have asked for the regular order, but I will yield to the Senator from South Dakota and to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] to call up bills, and then I shall insist upon the regular order.

Mr. GAMBLE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1802) to regulate the use by the public of reservoir sites located upon the public lands of the United States.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, company, or corporation to herd or pasture any cattle, sheep, horses, or other live stock upon any reservoir site or sites located upon the public lands of the United States under the provisions of the act of Congress approved January 13, 1897, when the reservoirs upon such sites have been constructed and are maintained as watering places in connection with the driving or transporting of live stock, or to enter upon such reservoir site or sites with the same herd or band of live stock more than once in twenty-four hours for the purpose of watering the same, or, except as provided in section 2 of this act, to allow or permit any such live stock to remain upon any such reservoir site or sites during any one day longer than may be necessary to water such live stock, which shall not exceed two hours.

SEC. 2. That it is further declared unlawful for any person, firm, company, or corporation owning or having control of any live stock to occupy or permit or allow to be occupied, for herding or pasturage of such live stock, any of the public lands of the United States within a radius of 2 miles of any reservoir site or sites located and established as provided in section 1 of this act, when the reservoirs upon such sites have been constructed and are maintained as watering places in connection with the driving or transporting of live stock: Provided, That any person, firm, company, or corporation driving live stock from the range of such person, firm, company, or corporation to a loading station for the purpose of shipment shall not be prevented by this act from occupying such reservoir site or the territory within a radius of 2 miles thereof for the rest of such live stock during the progress of the journey or during such time as it may be necessary to detain such stock thereon while waiting to load the same for shipment at such loading station: Provided further, That such time allowed for rest upon such reservoir site or prohibited radius herein mentioned, during the progress of the journey to the shipping point or loading station, shall not exceed three hours: Provided further, That the continued occupancy of such reservoir sites or prohibited radius for the purpose of loading for shipment shall not exceed seventy-two hours.

SEC. 3. That any person, firm, company, or corporation violating any of the provisions of this act shall be liable to a penalty of not less than $200 nor more than $500 for each offense.

SEC. 4. That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to prevent the lawful entry of the public lands under the public-land laws of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CULLOM. It seems to me that the bill ought to be explained by some one before it is acted upon. I see that the twenty-eight-hour law is proposed to be changed in the bill as I caught the reading of it. I should like to have some Senator state what it means.

Mr. GAMBLE. This measure has no relation whatever to the twenty-eight-hour law. It is simply an amendment to the existing law and is a Department measure. A similar bill was introduced in the last Congress, and was favorably reported by the Committee on Public Lands and passed by the Senate. It provides simply for the regulation of the use of reservoir sites that are constructed by individuals or by corporations and maintained by them so that they will not be unduly used; and it is to make them more serviceable for the public. There is no reason why the bill should not pass. It is guarded in every way possible.

Mr. CULLOM. I am glad to hear the Senator explain it. I only caught the bill as it was being read, and I thought I heard something stated in the bill proposing to change the twenty-eight-hour law to seventy-two hours, or something of that sort.

Mr. GAMBLE. It has no relation to the twenty-eight-hour law.

Mr. KEAN. That is the second bill on the Calendar, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. What the Senator from Illinois heard is merely a proviso allowing persons driving cattle to a train to keep them a certain period on a reservoir site.

Mr. GAMBLE. Yes; it is simply to protect the site from undue use by the public.

Mr. CULLOM. All I desired was that some Senator responsible for the bill should explain it, so that we could understand exactly the purpose of the measure.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ISSUANCE OF DUPLICATE CHECKS AND WARRANTS.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4) to amend section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by act of February 16, 1885.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. ALDRICH. From the Committee on Finance I move to strike out all after the word "follows," in the sixth line, and to insert the language which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "follows," in line 6, strike out the remainder of the bill and insert:

SEC. 3646. Whenever any original check or warrant is lost, stolen, or destroyed, the Secretary of the Treasury may authorize the officer issuing the same, after the expiration of six months and within three years from the date of such check or warrant, to issue a duplicate thereof upon the execution of such bond to indemnify the United States as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That when such original check or warrant does not exceed in amount the sum of $50 the Secretary of the Treasury may authorize the issuance of a duplicate at any time after the expiration of thirty days and within three years from the date of such check or warrant.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ACCOUNTS OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Regular order, Mr. President!

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

The bill (S. 189) to authorize the readjustment of the accounts of Army officers in certain cases, and for other purposes, was announced as first in order.

Mr. LODGE. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will go over without prejudice.

PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS IN TRANSIT.

The bill (S. 3413) to prevent cruelty to animals while in transit by railroad or other means of transportation from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia into or through another State or Territory or the District of Columbia, and repealing sections 4386, 4387, 4388, 4389, and 4390 of the United States Revised Statutes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is objection to that bill, Mr. President, and I ask that it may go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will lie over without prejudice.

Mr. KEAN. Let that bill go to the Calendar under Rule IX, Mr. President.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have asked that the bill retain its place on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill went over without prejudice.

Mr. KEAN. I have asked that it go over under Rule IX.

Mr. PENROSE. It is too late to do that now.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; the bill has already gone over.

Mr. FORAKER. As to that bill I wish to say that I desire to be present when it is taken up. Mr. SPOONER. From what committee does that joint resolution come?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. From the Committee on Foreign Relations. It was reported by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I was not present in the Committee on Foreign Relations when that joint resolution was considered. I suppose they gave due care to it, but it seems to me an entire usurpation of the powers of the Committee on the Judiciary. That committee certainly has recommended the passage of every law in regard to citizenship that has ever gone upon the statute books, and I do not see why we should have a special commission to ascertain what the law is or what it ought to be in regard to citizenship of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. This is for the protection of citizens abroad.

Mr. MORGAN. Is it confined to citizens abroad?

Mr. LODGE. I think so. The joint resolution was reported by the member of the Committee on Foreign Relations who is the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORGAN. If an objection will carry that joint resolution over, Mr. President, I must object.

The bill (H. R. 431) to open for settlement 505,000 acres of land in the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indian reservations, in Oklahoma Territory, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

SEC. 2. That for the preparation of the site so selected and the erection of the pedestal the sum of $4,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the design for said statue shall be approved by the commission herein created.

SEC. 3. That all railroad companies desiring the use of any railroad bridge built in accordance with the provisions of this act shall be entitled to equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains or cars over the same and over the approaches thereto upon payment of a reasonable compensation for such use; and in case of any disagreement between the parties in regard to the terms of such use or the sums to be paid all matters at issue shall be determined by the Secretary of War upon hearing the allegations and proofs submitted to him.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. It strikes me that it would be well to transpose sections 6 and 7, so as to make the repealing clause the last section. I make that motion.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

NEW JERSEY-DELAWARE TERRITORIAL LIMITS.

Mr. KNOX. I ask unanimous consent, out of order, to make a report. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4975) giving the consent of Congress to an agreement or compact entered into between the State of New Jersey and the State of Delaware respecting the territorial limits and jurisdiction of said States, to report it favorably with amendments to the preamble.

Mr. KEAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just reported. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think we had better proceed with the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. KEAN. Allow me to say to the Senator that this is an important matter. It concerns only the States of New Jersey and Delaware, and the bill proposes to settle a lawsuit which has been going on for more than sixty years. It will take but a moment.

Mr. GALLINGER. It being important, of course I withdraw my objection and will let the bill be considered.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

And whereas the said agreement has been confirmed by the legislatures of the said States of New Jersey and Delaware, respectively: Therefore—

So as to make the preamble and bill read:

Whereas commissioners duly appointed on the part of the State of New Jersey and commissioners duly appointed on the part of the State of Delaware, for the purpose of agreeing upon and settling the jurisdiction and territorial limits of the two States have executed certain articles, which are contained in the words following, namely:

"Whereas there is now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States a cause wherein the said State of New Jersey is the complainant and the said State of Delaware is the defendant, in which cause an injunction has been issued against the State of Delaware restraining the execution of certain statutes of the State of Delaware relating to fisheries in said river, which said litigation hath been pending for twenty-seven years and upwards; and

"Whereas for the purpose of adjusting the differences between the said two States arising out of said conflict of jurisdiction, Edward C. Stokes, Robert H. McCarter, Franklin Murphy, and Chauncey G. Parker have been appointed commissioners on the part of the State of New Jersey by joint resolution of the legislature of said State, and Preston Lea, Robert H. Richards, Herbert H. Ward, and George H. Bates have been appointed commissioners on the part of the State of Delaware by joint resolution of the general assembly of said State, to frame a compact or agreement between the said States and legislation consequent thereon, to be submitted to the legislatures of said two States for action thereon, looking to the amicable termination of said suit between said States now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, and the final adjustment of all controversies relating to the boundary line between said States, and to their respective rights in the Delaware River and Bay: Now, therefore,

"The said State of New Jersey, by its commissioners above named, and the said State of Delaware, by its commissioners above named, do hereby make and enter into a compact or agreement between said States as follows:

The inhabitants of the said States of Delaware and New Jersey shall have and enjoy a common right of fishery throughout, in, and over the waters of said river between low-water marks on each side of said river between the said States, except so far as either State may have heretofore granted valid and subsisting private rights of fishery.

"ART. IV. Immediately upon the execution hereof the legislature of of the State of New Jersey shall appoint three commissioners to confer with three commissioners to be immediately appointed by the general assembly of the State of Delaware for the purpose of drafting uniform laws to regulate the catching and taking of fish in the Delaware River and Bay between said two States, which said commissioners for each State, respectively, shall, within two years, from the date of their appointment, report to the legislature of each of said States the proposed laws so framed and recommended by said joint commission. Upon the adoption and passage of said laws so recommended by the respective legislatures of said two States said laws shall constitute the sole laws for the regulation of the taking and catching of fish in the said river and bay between said States. Said laws shall remain in force until altered, amended, or repealed by concurrent legislation of the said two States. Said commissioners shall also ascertain the dividing line between said river and bay, and upon each of the shores of said two States where said dividing line extended shall intersect the same, shall, at the joint expense of said States, erect a suitable monument to mark the said dividing line. Said dividing line between said monuments shall be the division line between the said river and bay for the interpretation of and for all purposes of this compact, and of the concurrent legislation provided for therein.

"Each State shall have and exercise exclusive jurisdiction within said river to arrest, try, and punish its own inhabitants for violation of the concurrent legislation relating to fishery herein provided for.

"ART. V. All laws of said States relating to the regulation of fisheries in the Delaware River not inconsistent with the right of common fishery hereinabove mentioned shall continue in force in said respective States until the enactment of said concurrent legislation as herein provided.

"ART. VI. Nothing herein contained shall affect the planting, catching, or taking of oysters, clams, or other shellfish, or interfere with the oyster industry as now or hereafter carried on under the laws of either State.

"ART. VII. Each State may, on its own side of the river, continue to exercise riparian jurisdiction of every kind and nature, and to make grants, leases, and conveyances of riparian lands and rights under the laws of the respective States.

"ART. VIII. Nothing herein contained shall affect the territorial limits, rights, or jurisdiction of either State of, in, or over the Delaware River, or the ownership of the subaqueous soil thereof, except as herein expressly set forth.

"ART IX. This agreement shall be executed by the said commissioners when authorized to do so by the legislatures of the said States. It shall thereupon be submitted to Congress for its consent and approval. Upon the ratification thereof by Congress it shall be and become binding in perpetuity upon both of said States; and thereupon the suit now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, in which the State of New Jersey is complainant and the State of Delaware is defendant, shall be discontinued without costs to either party and without prejudice. Pending the ratification hereof by Congress said suit shall remain in statu quo.

"Done in two parts (one of which is retained by the commissioners of Delaware, to be delivered to the governor of that State, and the other one of which is retained by the commissioners of New Jersey, to be delivered to the governor of that State) this 21st day of March, in the year of our Lord 1905.

NICOLA MASINO.

The bill (S. 2270) for the relief of Nicola Masino, of the District of Columbia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that all real estate lying in the District of Columbia heretofore purchased by and conveyed to Nicola Masino prior to the passage of the bill be relieved and exempted from the operation of the "Act to restrict the ownership of real estate in the Territories to American citizens."

GAMBLING IN THE TERRITORIES.

The bill (H. R. 10853) to prohibit gambling in the Territories was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. KEAN. Let the bill go over.

Mr. GALLINGER. I judge from what the Senator from Ohio said this morning that he would desire it to go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will go over without prejudice.

Mr. KEAN. The other bill went to the Calendar under Rule IX. I think this had better do likewise.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think so. Ask it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator ask that the bill go to the Calendar under Rule IX?

Mr. KEAN. I have no objection to its going to the Calendar under Rule IX.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that is proper.

Mr. KEAN. The other one went there, and they are practically the same thing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered, in the absence of objection.

(who was a grandson of President Zachary Taylor), a bust of President Zachary Taylor in her possession, if the same can be bought for a sum not exceeding $2,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. In line 4, before the word "Lola," I move to strike out the word "Mistress."

RIGHTS UNDER BERING SEA ARBITRATION AWARD.

Mr. SPOONER. On the 5th of March the Senate passed the bill (S. 2286) to confer jurisdiction upon the circuit court of the United States for the ninth circuit to determine in equity the rights of American citizens under the award of the Bering Sea arbitration of Paris and to render judgment thereon.

I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, in order that I might examine it somewhat, which I have done. I ask leave to withdraw the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin withdraws his motion to reconsider the bill, and the bill stands passed.

JOHN H. HAMITER.

The bill (S. 3283) for the relief of John H. Hamiter was announced as next in order.

Mr. LODGE. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will go over without prejudice.

Mr. SPOONER. Let it go over under Rule IX.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill, at the request of the Senator from Wisconsin, will go to the Calendar under Rule IX.

BRIDGES ACROSS DOG RIVER AND FOWL RIVER, ALABAMA.

The bill (S. 4513) to authorize the Mobile Railway and Dock Company to construct and maintain bridges across Dog River and Fowl River in Mobile County, State of Alabama, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PERKINS. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, if it is necessary to pass this special bill, since we have this morning passed a general bridge bill?

Mr. FRYE. Undoubtedly it is, because the general bridge bill may not become a law. It was amended in one particular, and there may be difficulty about its final passage in the other House.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in section 2, page 2, line 1, after the words "shall be," to strike out "a lawful structure and shall be known and recognized as a post route, and the same is hereby declared to be a post route" and insert "lawful structures and shall be known and recognized as post routes, and the same are hereby declared to be post routes;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That any bridges constructed under this act and according to its limitations shall be lawful structures and shall be known and recognized as post routes, and the same are hereby declared to be post routes, upon which, also, no higher charge shall be made for transportation over the same of the mails, the troops, or munitions of war of the United States than the rate per mile paid for transportation over railroads or public highways leading to the said bridges, and the United States shall have the right of way for a postal telegraph across said bridges.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BATTLE MOUNTAIN SANITARIUM RESERVE.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, some moments ago I asked that Order of Business 1180, House bill 15085, be passed over without prejudice. I did that at the moment because I got the impression from the Calendar that the bill had not been referred to a committee. I had no objection to the measure, but I did not understand it. I now wish to withdraw my objection, as I have looked into the bill, and I do not object to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa withdraws his objection to the bill (H. R. 15085) to set apart certain lands in the State of South Dakota, to be known as the Battle Mountain Sanitarium Reserve. If there is no further objection, the bill will be considered at this time. [A pause.] The Chair would invite the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the request of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE] that he be present when the bill is considered.

Mr. ALLISON. I suppose the Senator from South Dakota took it for granted that I had some objection to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the impression that the Senator from South Dakota desires the bill to pass, but he left that notice with the Secretary.

Mr. SPOONER. I suppose he did not want it killed in his absence.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no interest in the bill one way or the other, although I think it ought to pass.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the only purpose the Senator from South Dakota had was to be sure that it was not acted upon unfavorably in his absence.

Mr. TILLMAN. I notice that that bill is one of considerable length, and can hardly be disposed of before 2 o'clock.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has been read twice.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Chair declares that it can be passed without any further reading, I shall have no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN H. PARKER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President be requested to return to the House of Representatives the bill (H. R. 10588) entitled "An act granting a pension to John H. Parker."

JUVENILE COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 51) to create a juvenile court in and for the District of Columbia.

The Secretary proceeded to read the amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 12987.

Mr. GALLINGER. This, I believe, is a privileged matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is not my purpose to unduly press the unfinished business, but I do not think anyone is altogether satisfied with the present arrangement under which we are working——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from South Carolina suspend for a moment until the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill are fully laid before the Senate?

Mr. GALLINGER. It will take but a moment.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will give way.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the amendments of the House of Representatives, which were—

On page 1, line 8, after "States," insert "subject to removal by the President for cause by and with the advice and consent of."

On page 1, line 8, after "and," strike out "confirmed by."

On page 1, line 14, strike out "with pay during each calendar year" and insert "without deduction from salary."

On page 2, line 7, after "peace," insert "of said district."

On page 2, line 24, after "judge," insert "and such presiding judge is authorized to remove such probation officers or either of them, for cause."

On page 3, line 4, strike out "and."

On page 3, line 15, strike out "and."

On page 5, line 14, strike out "of" where it occurs the first time, and insert "may impose similar conditions in."

On page 6, line 4, after "court," insert "to said schools respectively."

On page 9, line 8, strike out "last."

On page 9, line 8, after "Saturday," strike out "of each of said jury."

On page 9, line 9, strike out "terms" and insert "prior to the beginning of the following term."

On page 15, after line 21, insert:

"SEC. 25. That the provisions of this act shall be in full force and effect on and after July 1, 1906, and all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed."

Change section 25 to section 26.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

H. R. 11275. An act increasing the penalty for certain offenses in the District of Columbia;

H. R. 14582. An act for the removal of snow and ice from the paved sidewalks of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

H. R. 15643. An act to authorize the Board of Visitors of the Government Hospital for the Insane to summon and examine witnesses under oath, and making it a misdemeanor for any such witness to refuse to attend or testify or produce books or papers when summoned; and

H. R. 16384. An act regulating the speed of automobiles in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, as I was saying a moment ago, it is not my purpose to unduly press the consideration of the railway rate regulation bill, but under the mode of procedure we are now following I think it is quite unsatisfactory, because taking it up at 2 o'clock there is hardly opportunity for more than one speech a day, as Senators very rarely are willing to make set speeches after 4 o'clock.

I feel that it is a matter of too great importance for us to have the appearance of dawdling or paltering with it, or losing unnecessary time. We have been working here for a couple of days on the Calendar, and we have passed a great many bills that are of no serious moment, whereas this important legislation is something that requires a great deal of discussion, I expect, and certainly a very serious consideration. I feel that we ought to give it as much attention as it deserves without obstructing necessary legislation.

I give notice now that I shall be glad if all those who want to speak on the bill will get ready as soon as possible. We do not want to have the bill lying here waiting and have Senators say, "Well, I want to speak on it," and then take a week, or two weeks, or three weeks, or a month to prepare such speeches. I therefore want to give notice that after to-morrow I will ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill immediately after the routine morning business, in order to give the day, or most of the day, to it. Of course we will give way for anything that is necessary or which would appeal to the Senate as desirable, but we want to press this legislation and let the Senate consider it calmly and fully, having Senators speak on it as often as they want or as long as Senators want, and we want to get to a vote as soon as possible.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, only for fear that there may be some improper inference drawn from what the Senator has said, I want to state that the delay in taking up the bill until the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived, so far as to-day is concerned, was on account of the preference in that respect of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who is now to address us. I talked with him yesterday about it, with a view to making time in the consideration of this measure. I want to speak on it myself before it is concluded, and I thought that I would like to know something of the order in which the speeches were to come.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am glad the Senator agrees that this measure is of too great importance for us to be losing two hours, or practically throwing away two hours, in the consideration of trivial matters when this great measure is before us. I give the notice to apply after to-morrow—I will state that I would begin to-morrow but for the fact that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] has given notice that at 2 o'clock to-morrow he will want to address the Senate, and it may disarrange things to change it.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will excuse me, I will state that the notice given by the Senator from Maryland is that he will begin after the routine morning business, and if the Senator carries out the notice given it will save time to-morrow.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the Senator from Maryland himself asked me to-day not to press for the consideration of the bill before 2 o'clock. Of course, if it is conformable to his wishes, I would be glad to have him carry out the notice he gave.

Mr. LODGE. I was reading what is on the Calendar; that is all. The Senator from Maryland gave notice that he would speak after the conclusion of the routine morning business to-morrow.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Maryland is here and can speak for himself. If he wishes to begin to-morrow after the routine business, of course it is all right. I want to conform to his wishes, and he told me himself that he preferred for certain reasons to begin to-morrow at 2 o'clock. But I want to notify the Senate that after to-morrow I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of this bill immediately after the routine morning business.

Mr. FORAKER. The only purpose I had in view, if the Senate will indulge me a moment, was to let it be known and go into the RECORD that there is no paltering, to use the language of the Senator from South Carolina, on the part of anybody who is opposed to the measure.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am trying to clear my own skirts without throwing rocks at anyone else or casting any insinuations. I am usually able to make myself understood. If I was undertaking to charge, or even to intimate, that anybody else was delaying it, I would say so in direct terms. But as the bill is in my keeping, and I have asked that it be taken up, and the 2 o'clock arrangement is the order of the Senate, or rather is under the regular rules, I now want to get away from the regular rules and go to the consideration of the bill as soon as we can get to it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, practically all the arguments which have been made against legislation giving the Interstate Commerce Commission power to substitute a reasonable rate for one found to be unreasonable are based upon three general propositions—

First. That with the exception of abuses arising out of rebates and discriminations, there are no grievances growing out of present transportation conditions which can not be remedied with as much expedition as safety to the legitimate interest involved will allow under laws now in force.

Second. That the proposed legislation would be disastrous to the railroads and to the country.

Third. That it would be unconstitutional.

It is obvious, if these several propositions or any of them are sound, there is either no necessity for this legislation, or, if needed, it would be ineffective because unlawful.

No Senator has defended or will, I presume, defend rebates and discriminations. All will agree, I suppose, that if present laws are insufficient to remedy these evils they should be adequately amended.

I shall therefore give no attention to the features of the measure under consideration which relate to these practices, but shall confine myself to the proposition to confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission power to fix rates under rules and standards prescribed by Congress.

Mr. President, I think I may assert as a general proposition, the soundness of which every public man's knowledge and experience will confirm, that the American people as a whole are not only conservative and tenacious in their adhesion to established policies, but that they frequently exhibit a degree of patience and forbearance with evils affecting their vital interests which are hampering and burdensome not equaled by any other people in the world. We have here, as they have everywhere, individuals and factions who raise a tumult over fancied wrongs, but our people never lend themselves to false clamor and are seldom misled by it. Whenever, therefore, the great mass and body of our people, without regard to section, vocation, or party alignment, are practically united in denouncing an existing system or condition as unjust and oppressive and in demanding a specific remedy, their protest and demand present an argument which, to a public servant at least, is or should be persuasive. This I believe to be the present attitude of a vast majority of the people of this country with respect to this rate question and the remedy proposed.

More than this, Mr. President, these protests and demands present in themselves a mass of evidence—an overwhelming aggregation of facts—growing out of the daily experience of 80,000,000 people with an existing business condition showing that the evils of which they complain are actual and militant.

In support, therefore, of the contention that existing transportation rates are in many instances unjust and unreasonably high, and that unfair and ruinous discriminations are practiced against individuals and localities, I wish here and now to put in evidence the almost innumerable petitions, memorials, and resolutions which have come to us from the legislatures of great States, from associations of bankers, merchants, livestock men, farmers, and laborers, as well as the complaints and demands of the great mass of producers and consumers from every part and section of the country which have found utterance through the press.

Mr. President, the railroads deny the justice of these complaints of the people and rely upon three general statements with reference to railroad rates and profits to show that they are unfounded:

First. They allege that their tariff schedules show that there has been little, if any, change in recent years in the rates charged against the six great classes into which for that purpose freights are subdivided.

Second. That statistics show that there has been practically no increase, if not in fact a small decrease, in recent years in the average rate per ton-mile.

Third. That profits on railroad investments are small.

These statements may be or they may not be true, but whether true or false the conclusions sought to be drawn from them are not only misleading but they are false.

The fact, Mr. President, if it be a fact, that the specific schedules of the six great classes into which most subjects of transportation are segregated and to which a common charge is applied have not been increased would not show, nor would it tend to show, that the freights actually paid by producers and shippers have not been increased. What it would show, and all that it would show, is that if rates have been increased they have not been increased by the open and above-board process of raising these class charges. As a matter of fact, shown by railroad statistics themselves, as well as by the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission, railroad rates have been increased and largely increased during the last six years not by the process of raising the specific rate of schedule or commodities, but by the more insidious method of commodity reclassifications.

Beginning with the year 1900, hundreds and even thousands of articles have been reclassified by raising them from a lower to a higher priced class in the various orders promulgated by the railroads in the several divisions into which they have divided for this purpose the whole country. In one classification, known as Order No. 20, issued early in that year and applying to northern and eastern traffic, there were nearly 600 reclassifications, of which 572 were increases and only 6 reductions. By another reclassification order made in the same year and known as Order No. 30, and applying to western business, 257 reclassifications were made, of which 240 were increases and only 17 reductions, while by Order No. 25, applying to southern traffic, made in same year, out of 636 reclassifications 531 were increases.

Mr. President, candor requires that I should say that as to some of these orders there are more reductions than there are increases, and that, considering all reclassifications made during these years, it may be that the number of articles actually raised did not greatly exceed the number nominally reduced; but, Mr. President, the relative number of articles raised or reduced is comparatively unimportant. The significant fact is the commercial importance of the articles so raised or reduced and the resultant increase or decrease in the cost of their transportation. Now, Mr. President, an examination will conclusively show that during these years the commodities reduced compared with those increased are not only relatively of little commercial importance, but that the percentage of the reduction in rates on articles reduced is far below the percentage of increase in rates on articles increased.

For example, as a result of these reclassifications, in 1900 hay was raised from the sixth to the fifth class, and the freight on it thereby increased 80 cents per ton. In 1903, by the same process, the rate on iron and steel was advanced 20 cents, that on coal 10 cents, and that on lumber 40 cents.

These and like commodities which have been advanced by this process are articles of enormous production and consumption, constituting in the aggregate a large per cent of the total railroad tonnage of the country. It is obvious, therefore, Mr. President, that an increase in the rates charged on a few articles of this character more than offsets many hundreds of reductions on commodities of lesser commercial importance.

I have in my hands a letter from the chairman of the railroad commission of my own State, a lawyer of great ability, who has devoted the last six years of his life almost exclusively to the study of questions connected with his official duties, in which he says that the railroads of that State in 1902 attempted a sweeping reclassification of the subjects of transportation which, had it not been prevented by the commission over which he presides, would have raised rates upon domestic traffic in that State at least 33⅓ per cent.

Mr. President, I have often thought if every commodity of commerce had attached to it a label showing the difference in its cost to the final purchaser on account of our high tariff schedules, the rankest "stand-patter" in Congress would be unable to resist the overwhelming demand which would come to us for a reduction of these schedules. Likewise as overwhelming is the present demand for Government interference to protect the people against excessive railroad rates. I have no doubt the substitution of the reclassification method of rate advancement for the more open method of raising specific rates of schedules and commodities has served the railroad well and operated to both postpone and lessen the force of the present demand for relief, but, as in the case of the tariff, so in the case of the railroads, the truth is being forced home to the people by the heavy drafts made upon their earnings, and their mutterings of discontent grow louder and louder day by day.

Mr. President, the argument made by the railroads and in their behalf, based upon a comparison of the present average rate per ton-mile with that of a few years ago, is, as I said before, misleading, but even if the contention of the railroads that there has been no increase in this rate should be admitted, it would not justify the conclusion sought to be drawn from it, that there has been no material increase in the rates actually paid and collected. A superficial analysis of the problem will suffice to show that the average rate per ton-mile paid during two different periods, obtained by a calculation of total freights, number of miles it was hauled and charges actually paid for hauling it in two given periods, may be and are in certain circumstances of but little or no value in determining the actual difference in the transportation charges of these respective periods.

It is obvious if the high-grade commodities on which high rates are charged are mixed indiscriminately with low-grade commodities upon which lower rates are charged the average cost per ton-mile will be influenced to a far greater extent by the amount of tonnage hauled than by the rate charged. In other words, if the volume of low-grade commodities is increased while the volume of the high-grade commodities is stationary, or if the volume of the former is increased out of proportion to that of the latter without changing the specific charges against either, the average per ton-mile will be reduced or e converso raised. To illustrate: If two given sums of money are loaned, one at a higher and the other at a lower rate of interest, the average return from each dollar so loaned will be less than the higher and more than the lower rate charged.

Now, it is plain if the amount let at a lower rate is greatly increased while that let at a higher rate is not increased at all, or if the former is increased out of proportion to the latter, the average return from each dollar so let will be reduced or e converso increased.

Now, Mr. President, it is a fact of common knowledge, shown by statistics and verified by the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission, that during the period of our great prosperity and business activity there has been an increase in the volume of low-grade freights altogether out of proportion to the increase in volume of high-grade freights, and that this fact has held down the increase in the average rate per ton-mile.

For instance: Manufactures, which are high grade and high price commodities, constituted, in 1890, 13.52 per cent of the total railroad tonnage of that year originating on all roads, and in 1904 only 13.41 per cent of that tonnage. Merchandise, also high grade and high price commodities, constituted, in 1890, 4.73 per cent of the total railroad tonnage of that year originating on all roads, and in 1904 only 4.83 per cent of that tonnage—practically no increase in relative percentage. On the other hand, coal and ore and other products of the mines, which are low grade and low price products, constituted, in 1890, only 47.32 per cent, while in 1904 they constituted 51.56 per cent of our total railroad tonnage, or, stated in figures, these products constituted in 1890, only 129,000,000 out of a total tonnage in that year of 274,000,000, while in 1904 they constituted 330,000,000 out of a total tonnage of 641,000,000 originating on all railroads. Lumber and other products of the forest, also low grade and low price products, constituted in 1889 only 10.89 per cent, and in 1904, 12.53 per cent of the total railroad tonnage of that year, or, stated in round figures, these products constituted in 1889 only 48,000,000 out of a total tonnage in that year of 441,000,000, while in 1904 they constituted 80,000,000 out of a total tonnage in that year of 641,000,000 originating on all railroads. On this estimate, to avoid the duplication necessarily involved, I do not include tonnage received from connecting roads.

With practically no increase during these years in the tonnage of manufactures and merchandise and other like high grade and high price commodities, contemporaneously with this enormous increase in the products of the mine and forest, and other like low grade and low price commodities, is it not apparent if there had not been a great increase in specific rates there would of necessity have been not a small but a large decrease in the average rate per ton-mile?

But, Mr. President, if, for the reasons I have just stated, there has been in recent years no increase in the average rate per ton-mile, the records of the railroads themselves show that there has undoubtedly been during this time a decidedly large increase in the average rate per ton.

For the year ending June 30, 1901, the increase in this average over the year ending June 30, 1899, was 7.49 cents per ton, the aggregate increase in revenue to the railroads from this cause in that year being, in round numbers, $80,000,000. For the year ending June 30, 1903, the average rate per ton was nearly 12¾ cents greater than in the year ending June 30, 1899, the aggregate increase in revenue to the railroads from this cause in that year being over $150,000,000.

Now, is it not plain, in these conditions, if there had been no increase in specific rates the average rate per ton as well as the average rate per ton-mile would of necessity have been reduced, and the fact that this general average per ton-mile was not materially reduced, while that per ton was increased, as I have shown, from 7 to 12 cents in five years shows to the point of demonstration that specific rates have been largely increased in that time?

Again, Mr. President, it is not true that profits from capital invested in railroads in this country are relatively small. As a matter of fact, as I shall show, legitimate railroad profits have greatly increased in recent years. Of course, the average percentage of profits could not be expected to be large upon a capitalization including millions, and even billions, of dollars, based not upon cost of physical properties nor upon tangible values at all, but based mainly upon estimated earning capacity.

By this process of capitalization, which a few years ago under the initiative of a great financier became a fad in circles of frenzied finance, a large part of our 215,000 miles of railway and over 800 independent lines have been organized and recapitalized.

There is a railroad in my own State whose stock sold at one time since the war at $40 per share of the par value of $100. This road has recently been taken into a consolidated system, two shares of preferred stock and two shares of common stock, of the par value of $100 each, being issued for each and every share of the original company, and this railroad is to-day on this basis of four to one, earning dividends and carrying each year a snug sum to surplus profits.

This is given as a striking example of the way in which a large part of our more than 800 independent lines have in a few years been reorganized and recapitalized into the six or eight groups which now control the entire railroad mileage of the country.

Notwithstanding this false and fictitious capitalization, on account of the enormous earning capacity of our railroads the percentage of railroad stocks paying dividends and the earning capacity of railroads has materially increased in recent years and is still increasing.

In 1883 the percentage of railroad stocks paying dividends was only 38.56 per cent, and the average rate of dividend paid on these stocks was only 5.38 per cent; the amount paid in dividends in that year being only a little over $80,000,000. In 1904 the percentage of railroad stocks paying dividends had increased to 57.47 per cent, and the average rate of dividends on these stocks had increased to 6.09 per cent—the amount paid in dividends in that year exceeding the enormous sum of $220,000,000.

But, Mr. President, dividends do not correctly measure the profits of railroad investment. The true measure of these profits is the balance left after payment of operating expenses, interest charges, and taxes. In 1890 the sum of this balance, including all railroads, was, in round figures, $74,000,000, while in 1904 it aggregated the great sum of $327,000,000.

In 1887 the amount of railroad earnings per mile was $6,362; in 1904 they were $9,306, an increase in that time of about $3,000 per mile. In 1889 the average revenue per train mile, including all trains, was $1.22, and in 1904 it was $1.93, a gain of 71 cents per mile. In 1889 the average cost of operating a train 1 mile, including all kinds of trains, was 81 cents per mile, and in 1904 it was $1.31, a difference in cost of 50 cents, showing a net increase in profits for this time of 21 cents per train mile, including all kinds of trains.

This increase of 18.91 per cent in dividend-paying stocks, of $253,000,000 in net profits, of $3,000 per mile in earnings, and of 21 cents in profits per train mile shows undisputably that there has been during the last ten or fifteen years not only a steady, but a large increase in the profits of railroad investments.

Mr. President, what reason is there to justify the contention of the railroads that this legislation will bring disaster to them or to the country?

Is it true, as contended, that our railroads can not make money and prosper unless they are permitted, without outside interference, to make and enforce their own rates without regard to the interest and the rights of the people?

For many years past and to-day our railroads have not had altogether a free hand in fixing their tariff charges on intra-State business. In twenty-five States to-day, and in most of that number for years past, rates on all domestic traffic (and this traffic constitutes 20 per cent of the entire transportation business of the country) have been fixed either by local commissions or by railroads under their control and supervision.

The statement that for many years past and to-day our railroads have not had a free hand in fixing their tariffs is also true as to a large part of interstate as well as of domestic business.

It is a well-known fact that within this time certain combinations have monopolized many of the prime commodities of industry and commerce, and, through the enormous volume of business they can give or withhold, aided by the devices of private switches, cars, refrigeration, ventilation, and icing, have for some time past compelled, and to-day in many instances compel, the railroads to accept such compensation as they are willing to pay for the transportation of commodities in which they deal or for the traffic which they control.

This control of the big shippers includes not only the oil and fresh-meat business of the country, but it extends to the fruit business, the dairy business, the truck business, and the brewing business, as well as to other important lines of business. This traffic, added to the domestic traffic of the States having commissions with rate-fixing powers, constitutes no inconsiderable portion of the total freightage of the country, with respect to which the railroads do not now and have not for a long time past exercised a free hand over rates.

This interference with their control over rates on this large portion of their business has not proven disastrous to the railroads; it has neither bankrupted them nor prevented them from making money and paying dividends on stocks largely—in some instances several times—in excess of the value of their tangible properties.

Mr. President, I do not wish to be misunderstood about this matter of rates. While I believe—indeed, while I am sure—that rates have been greatly increased since the beginning of the year 1900, I do not believe that all rates, or even the larger part of them, are to-day unreasonably high, or that at present the trend of rates is upward. I believe that to a considerable degree commercial conditions are allowed to control in adjusting rates, and that when these conditions control they are generally adjusted fairly.

My contention is that most of the evils of which the people complain, and have a right to complain, and which demand remedy at our hands at this time, grow out of the abnormally high rates arbitrarily fixed by many railroads in disregard and defiance of these commercial conditions, and the abnormally low and discriminatory rates forced upon the railroads by the big shippers in the way and manner I have described.

The remedy for these evils, in my judgment, Mr. President, consists not so much in Government rate making, since to the extent the railroads fix their tariffs in response to commercial conditions there is little need for Government interference, as in effective governmental control and regulation with incidental power to fix rates and enforce them where it is found necessary to do so in order to protect the people on the one hand against these unreasonable and extortionate rates, rooted in the greedy scramble of railroads for more and higher dividends, and on the other hand to protect both the railroads and the people against the "hold-up" of these monopolistic combinations of shippers.

If the bill under consideration shall pass and can be and is enforced in the intendment of its friends, it will give the Interstate Commerce Commission power to restrain the indecent rapacity of both these offending railroads and these big shippers. When this is done, Mr. President, rates will, I believe, as a rule adjust themselves to commercial conditions and there will be but little further necessity for governmental interference.

A consideration of the effects upon the railroads of supervision of rates in the past, both by the Government and the States, will demonstrate, I think, that the predictions made by the railroads and on their behalf of injury likely to follow from the enactment of this legislation are unfounded.

Mr. President, during the ten years from 1887 to 1897, in which the Interstate Commerce Commission actually exercised the power of fixing rates, 45,000 miles of railway were constructed in this country. There is nothing in the railroad and business history of those years attributable to the exercise by the Commission of this power, which, in my opinion, justifies these predictions of disaster should Congress now give the Commission the powers exercised by it during these early years of its existence.

The fact that in eight years the railroads did not judicially challenge the power of the Commerce Commission to fix rates under the act of 1887, despite the fact that that power, if conferred at all, was conferred only by implications taken in connection with the fact that in over 400 answers filed to complaints in proceedings before the Commission during this time this power of the Commission was not challenged, strongly confirms the conclusion that they did not find themselves seriously hampered or crippled by the right of rate supervision then claimed and exercised.

Twenty-five years ago the States began to assert their inherent powers over transportation charges, and to create commissions vested with control over rates on all domestic business. To-day, and in the case of many of them for many years past, twenty-six States have commissions exercising powers over domestic business far more plenary than those it is now proposed to give to the Commerce Commission over traffic between the States.

There is nothing in the history of these States in these years which shows or tends to show that the railroads or the people have suffered as a result of this supervision and control, or that this power has been exercised vexatiously, arbitrarily, or oppressively. On the contrary, their railroad, agricultural, industrial, and commercial progress compares favorably with that of the States in which the railroads have been given a free hand in adjusting rates, and in many of them the development along these lines has been so far above the general average as to attract widespread attention.

In support of this statement I call attention to the fact that of the nineteen States and Territories in which railroad mileage was increased over 100 miles in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, fourteen were States which had commissions with rate-making powers.

There can be no stronger confirmation of these statements, and there can be no stronger refutation of the calamity arguments against Government interference with rates than that afforded by results in my own State. Since 1891 North Carolina has had a commission with full rate-making power. When this law was passed we had only a little over 3,000 miles of railroads. We now have about 4,000 miles, an increase of about 900 miles, while to-day at least a dozen new lines are in process of construction, with several more projected. Some of these roads are being built by our own people, some by Rockefeller and his associates, and some by rich New England and northern syndicates. All the capital needed for the purpose can be had inside the State or outside by the mere asking.

When this law was passed in 1891, several railroads in my State were in the hands of receivers. Now there is not one in the hands of a receiver. When it was passed, gross receipts from railroad operation in the State were, in round numbers, $8,600,000; net receipts, $3,100,000. In 1904 gross receipts were $20,300,000; net receipts, $7,500,000.

Not only in North Carolina, but in Georgia, in Mississippi, in Minnesota, and in a number of other States having commissions with rate-making powers, railroad mileage, the value of manufactured products and of farm property has increased at a rate so rapid as to attract general attention and comment.

In this connection I want to read an extract from a letter from Hon. Franklin McNeill, chairman of the railroad commission of North Carolina. It furnishes a striking argument against the objection to the proposed legislation so persistently urged that under the power to revise and correct a challenged rate the Commerce Commission will put its hand upon every schedule and in the end take over the whole rate-making power and render scientific and equitable rate adjustment by the railroads difficult, if not impossible. It sustains, by way of practical example, the contention of the friends of this legislation that the possession by the Interstate Commerce Commission of effective power over rates will render the use of that power in a large measure unnecessary, and will operate to coerce the railroads to correct upon their own initiative the inequalities and injustices of which the people complain. In this letter Mr. McNeill, speaking of rate making by the commission over which he has for eight years presided, says:

> While we have full rate-making powers, we have not attempted to supersede traffic managers of railroads; on the contrary, we have adopted tariffs made by them and only changed rates on certain commodities as they appeared to be unreasonable or unjust. This has not been frequent; the fact that we had the power rendered it unnecessary.

It is customary, Mr. President, to stigmatize rate making by government boards as political rate making, and to charge that either through ignorance or in response to popular clamor these boards can not be trusted to deal wisely and fairly with the interests of the railroads. Much is attempted to be made in this connection out of the number of times the Interstate Commerce Commission has been overruled by the courts as tending to show ignorance or bias. Much is attempted to be made out of the fact that out of 45 cases appealed to the courts the Commission has been reversed in 29. During the period of these 45 appeals the Commission tried and disposed of 327 cases. In over 280 of these cases the railroads did not appeal, thereby admitting their justice, fairness, and soundness. To say that the Commission has been overruled in 29 cases out of a total of 45 is not, therefore, a correct statement of the case. A correct statement will show that out of a total of about 327 decisions the Commission was overruled in only 29. More than that, Mr. President, a proper consideration of these cases will show that the Commission has not made as many mistakes as the tariff managers whose rates they have changed because they were found to be unreasonable, and therefore unlawful.

Mr. President, all laws must of necessity be interpreted and administered by men, and the argument that the public can not trust those delegated to administer the law is not an admissible argument in a Government like ours. If the personnel of a Commission is unfit, the unworthy members should be removed, but to refuse to legislate where legislation is needed for the public welfare for fear that worthy and fit men can not be found to administer the law is to attack the very fundamentals of our system and question the capacity of our people for self-government.

We had as well look the fact in the face. The plain truth in this contest between these corporations and the people is that the railroads want the laws affecting them administered by tribunals composed of men appointed for life and whose amenability to the people is therefore remote. They are not opposed to trusting the powers conferred by this legislation in the Commerce Commission, because they do not believe competent and impartial men will at all times compose that Commission, but because they fear that the power of the people to quickly call them to account for any forgetfulness of their interest will lead them to put the public weal above that of special privilege. Of the score or more State commissions which for twenty-five years have exercised power over domestic rates, not one, so far as I know, or have ever heard, is amenable to the charge of having sacrificed the legitimate interest of a railroad to public clamor.

They have made mistakes and committed errors, no doubt, but so have the courts and all other human tribunals.

All of our laws, both State and national, providing for supervision or regulation of great private enterprises affected with a public use or duty are administered by officers, boards, commissions, or tribunals whose functions are administrative or executive. I know of no reason why the proposed regulation of the business of the railroads, made necessary by conditions for which they are solely responsible, can not be safely administered in the same way. I know of no reason which entitles them to the exemption which they claim and assert with such confident persistency.

Mr. President, I have no objection to such right of review by the courts as does not in effect either interfere with the rightful authority of Congress in this matter of rates, or so hamper it in the discharge of these powers through its Commission as to defeat or render ineffective in whole or in part its lawful purposes with respect to this subject.

Within these limitations the right of review by the courts ought not to be denied, and if it does not already exist it ought to be conferred; but, Mr. President, I submit that the courts already have without further legislation all the authority and power over this subject which they can exercise without substituting their judgment for that of Congress in a matter intrusted by the Constitution to the exclusive judgment of Congress.

In saying the courts have this power I am not unmindful of the fact that all Federal courts of original jurisdiction are statutory courts in the sense that Congress, acting under constitutional injunction, created them and defined their jurisdiction; but, sir, when these courts were created and given jurisdiction over certain specific subjects they became eo instanti, without constitutional grant to that effect, invested with all the judicial powers of the Constitution over and pertaining to that subject.

When Congress invested these courts with jurisdiction over the property rights with which this legislation deals, as it undoubtedly did, the Constitution did the rest by imposing upon them the duty of safeguarding these rights against any and all unconstitutional acts of the legislative and executive branches of the Government and all their agencies. In the discharge of these great powers and these great duties these courts are clothed with all equitable jurisdiction necessary for their exercise and performance.

Under the law as now written the courts, by virtue of their general powers, can set aside, at the instance of the carrier, a confiscatory rate, and perhaps at the instance of the shipper, an extortionate rate, but under this bill the courts will not have, and they ought not to have, the right to interfere with and set aside a just and reasonable rate fixed by the Commission. They will not have that power and they ought not to have it, because the establishment of rates is a matter which the Constitution intrusts to the judgment of Congress and such administrative agencies as it may employ to carry out its will.

My chief apprehension concerning this measure is that while the courts have not the constitutional right, as I see it, to review a lawful rate fixed and ordered by the Commission, and while this bill by not conferring it denies to them that right, still in actual practice, by means of interlocutory orders based upon ex parte showings of unreasonableness, these orders may be suspended pending litigation, and in this way many unreviewable as well as reviewable orders of the Commission will be held in abeyance until final decree.

It is probable that the only escape from this danger will be found in taking from the courts the right to suspend the orders of the Commission in any and all cases. If Congress can do this, would it be right to do it, would it be good policy to do it? Whether good or bad policy, if it would be wrong or unjust to do it we can not, as individuals or as a nation, afford to do it for mere profit's sake.

In all history there is no grander utterance than that of Aristides when, on a memorable occasion, he said to the Athenian people, "What Themistocles proposes would be greatly to your advantage, but it would be unjust."

In opposition to this suggestion it is said in behalf of the carrier that the Constitution guarantees him against the taking of his property by the shipper without due process and without just compensation, and that if the rate fixed by the Commission can not be enjoined pendente lite he will be denied the full benefit of this guaranty in case he is successful in his suit, and left without remedy as to that part of his property taken before final decree.

The force of this argument is obvious, but, Mr. President, the law and the Constitution also guarantees the shipper against the taking of his property by or for the benefit of the carrier without due process and without compensation. Now, if the rate established by the carrier is unreasonable, it is, for that reason, unlawful. If it is extortionate, to that extent it would be a taking by the carrier of the property of the shipper without due process and without compensation. If, therefore, the order of the Commission is restrained pendente lite, the shipper would be denied the full benefit of the law and of this constitutional guaranty and left without remedy as to that part of his property taken by the shipper between the time of its suspension and the final decree.

If, in answer to this argument, it be said on behalf of the carrier that the writ of restraint can only issue upon a prima facie showing under oath that the order unconstitutionally takes his property without compensation, the reply on behalf of the shipper is that the order protecting him is based on the finding of the Commission made not on an ex parte showing, but after full hearing and investigation, that his property has already been unlawfuly and unconstitutionally taken for the benefit of the carrier and will, until the final decree, continue to be so taken if it is suspended, not only without compensation or due process, but without any process whatever.

In these conditions it will be seen, therefore, if the order is not suspended pendente lite, and the carrier succeeds in his suit, his property will be unlawfully taken, and if it is so suspended and the Commission is sustained the shipper's property will be unlawfully taken. It is a case in which necessarily one or the other, the shipper or the carrier, must suffer. Which shall it be—the master or the servant? The answer, I believe, will largely be found in the inquiry as to which, in balancing probabilities as to the final result of the controversy, is entitled to the greater weight, a finding based on an ex parte hearing without argument of opposing counsel or a finding after full hearing with both parties to the controversy present and speaking through their witnesses and attorneys, by a board created by the law to make that finding.

In these conditions the impartial mind—and the legislative mind should be impartial—will, I think, conclude that the finding of the Commission so reached raises a stronger probability that the rate supplanted was unreasonable or extortionate, and will on final hearing be so found and adjudged, than that the ex parte showing of the carrier raises that the substituted rate is confiscatory and will be so found and adjudged on the final hearing.

Undoubtedly it is the duty of the legislator to protect the shipper and his rights, as much so as it is his duty to protect the carrier and his rights.

Can this be done; and if so, how? Ordinarily in such cases mutual bonds afford reasonable protection. In this case it is apparent that such bonds will be of little or no practical value. Impounding the difference between the rate supplanted and that substituted will help, and this should be done if nothing better can be done. But manifestly this would be a mere makeshift, and at best would fall short of adequate protection even to the middleman, and would be practically none at all to the man upon whom the loss would, in the final analysis, chiefly fall.

If there is any way to secure protection to each of these conflicting interests without abridging the equity jurisdiction of the courts, that way ought to be found and incorporated in this bill. The situation would seem to devolve the duty of finding that way upon those who insist that this function of the courts should not be impaired, but, on the contrary, should be in express terms reasserted and affirmed in this bill. But however this may be, if no way can be found to accomplish this end—and I greatly fear none can be—I have reluctantly reached the conclusion that we should, if we have the power, employ it to prevent the suspension, pending suit and before final hearing, of the rate prescribed by the Commission.

Can Congress do this? Undoubtedly Congress has large regulatory and supervisory power over these courts, their procedure, and the remedies they may use in the enforcement and protection of rights, whether they be statutory rights or rights constitutionally derived and protected.

The proposition that Congress can say to the courts in these conditions, in this case, "Your writ, while affording protection to the carrier, would deny the same or equal protection to the shipper, and as the law, as it is at present written, does not afford him this protection, and as we are unable to otherwise provide for him this protection, you must not and you shall not interfere, except to administer the rights of the litigants as you may find them when you are ready to pronounce your final conclusion as to them," presents to my mind a very serious question, with regard to which I frankly confess I have grave doubts and misgivings, and concerning which I do not care to venture a confident opinion without further investigation and reflection. All I am prepared to say at this time is if we have the power to do this—and I am strongly inclined to think we have this power—and no way can be found to give to the shipper the same protection in this behalf which a suspension of the rate would give to the carrier, then, and in that case, in my opinion it would be our duty to exercise this power in such a way as it may lawfully be exercised to accomplish this result.

Mr. President, the evils with which we are confronted are not such as can be remedied through the courts, either upon the initiative of the individual sufferer or the Government on behalf of the complaining public. Any law regulating or attempting to regulate the great corporated business enterprises of the country, affecting the interests of the whole people, over which the Government has the right of supervision in the interest of the public, which can only be enforced through the courts, is, so far as the accomplishment of adequate results is concerned, doomed to failure from the beginning; not because of any weakness or corruption of the personnel of the courts—for our judges are rarely subject to that criticism—but because of the inadequate machinery and powers of the courts to quickly, efficiently, and comprehensively exert and apply the law and its remedies in enforcing obedience and punishing disobedience to its commands and requirements.

The futility of any attempt to regulate these great corporated enterprises through the medium of the courts is exemplified in the open defiance and contempt displayed by the trusts of our antitrust laws, which the courts have declared ample in provision and scope, at least, to remedy the evils they denounce. In spite of these laws and the courts, these great monopolies continue in the light of day and within the knowledge of everybody, organizing and extending their corporate combinations and increasing their levies and exaction upon the people. If we had a commission from which corporations engaged in interstate business had to secure a license, with power to withhold or revoke them whenever it was shown, after full hearing, that they were violating these laws, some wrong might be done these corporations, but the wrongs done them would not be one-tenth as great as the wrongs daily suffered by the people at their hands as the result of the insufficiency of the courts to adequately administer the remedial provisions of these antitrust and antimonopoly laws. So a commission with power to regulate railroad rates will doubtless commit some errors which will inflict some injury upon the railroads, but the wrongs thus done will not be one-tenth as great as the wrongs now daily suffered by the people at the hands of the railroads because of the inadequacy of the powers of the Commission under present laws to stay their unjust and discriminating exactions.

Mr. President, I am not disturbed by the arguments assailing the constitutionality of this legislation. During the twenty-odd years in which Congress and the States have assumed control over rates, no court in this country has pronounced against the right of these sovereignties to exercise their powers of control over rates of common carriers through commissions. Upon the initiative of the railroads the Supreme Court has, it is true, decided that Congress did not, by the act of 1887, confer the power to fix rates upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, but no judgment has been invoked or rendered during this time against the constitutional right of Congress to confer this power upon the Commission, should it decide to do so and employ language adequate for the purpose.

The contention of those who sustain the constitutional rightfulness of this legislation is that the power now sought to be conferred upon the Commission to condemn an existing rate and to fix a future rate is essentially administrative, and that if, in the exercise of these powers, functions in any degree legislative or judicial are involved, they are involved only incidentally, as appertaining to the mental process which the mind undergoes in reaching a conclusion in doing an administrative as well as a judicial and legislative act, and does not deprive the powers exercised of the essential character of an administrative function, within the sense and meaning of the constitutional provisions divorcing the three great coordinate departments of the Government.

It is true that the powers conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission by the existing law and in the Hepburn bill to condemn as unreasonable a challenged rate, involves the exercise of quasi judicial functions, but they are not in essence and in fact judicial functions, because neither under the present law nor in the proposed enactment is the Commission vested with the power to enforce its determinations by any decree, mandate, order, or proceeding deriving its efficacy from any authority lodged by law in it.

Under the present law the Commission may, it is true, go into court, and if its contention is sustained obtain a decree and mandate to enforce it; but this decree derives its efficacy, not from any power invested by the law in the Commission, but solely from that of the court making it.

Under the Hepburn bill it is also true that if the orders of the Commission are not obeyed obedience to them may be enforced by the imposition of compelling fines and penalties; but this obedience can not be enforced in virtue of any power it is proposed to invest in the Commission or by any writ deriving its authority from any power it is proposed to invest in it. That can be done only by the imposition of punishments prescribed by Congress or by a resort to the courts, as provided in the act.

Mr. President, undoubtedly the power to fix future rates of hire of common carriers by rail is a legislative power, and as such is invested solely in Congress. If Congress should attempt to delegate that power in all its fullness and completeness to the Interstate Commerce Commission, that would remit to the Commission the whole power of Congress over this subject, and clothe it with the right to settle not only the amount of toll a carrier might exact, but the policy and principle which should govern in the determination of these charges. Such an attempt would contravene the constitutional inhibition to which I have just alluded and would be nugatory. The Hepburn bill makes no such attempt. It settles and declares the legislative policy with respect to this question by prescribing the rule and standard of rates, and simply directs the Commission to find the facts, apply to them this rule and standard, and declare the result.

With that policy the Commission has absolutely nothing to do. Its duty is confined to ascertaining and declaring what is an unreasonable and what is a reasonable, what is a fair and what is an unfair compensation for specific service. It can not say the public welfare would be subserved by this or that policy with reference to rates. It can not say, for instance, that the public welfare would be subserved by a 2-cent passenger fare. It can not say, for instance, that a lower freight rate, by encouraging production and increasing traffic, might redound alike to the benefit of the people and the roads. It can not say, for instance, that public interest would be promoted by a lower rate upon one line of commodities and a higher upon another. It can not say, for instance, that the exigencies of our foreign trade require that the railroads be permitted to charge a higher rate for the transportation of products for domestic consumption than for the transportation of products for export. And it can not say, for instance, that here is a vast undeveloped section of the country, rich in natural resources, and its speedy settlement and development would be advanced and the interest of the country at large, and especially that portion of it, would be promoted by prescribing a different rule of rates for it from that prescribed for older and more populous regions.

The Commission can not establish or vary rates upon conditions such as these, as Congress might undoubtedly do, but it must apply to all railroads in all sections of the country and in all conditions the same rigid rule and principle, by requiring that they shall charge only a just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative compensation for the service performed under the conditions of its performance.

In fixing these rates it may employ experts; it may have recourse to all known sources of information and consider all elements that fairly enter into the problem; but with the legislative questions of expediency and policy it has nothing to do. That is enunciated in the rule which declares broadly for the principle of equality in rates by decreeing that the fundamental consideration in their determination shall be in all cases fixed upon the basis of fair remuneration for the service performed.

The question of what is a fair consideration for hauling a carload of coal or coke or iron is no more a legislative function than the question of what is a fair compensation for a day's work or for building a ship or constructing a building is a legislative question. In determining what is a fair compensation for a day's work, whether in the field or the factory or at one of the desks in the great Departments of this Government, many considerations are involved, such as the cost of living, the prevailing price for similar service, the efficiency of the laborer, his training, skill, and the market value of the usufruct of his labor. The problem of determining what is a fair compensation for hauling a load of coal or coke or iron a given distance may be more difficult and more complex than that of determining the fair price of a day's labor or for building a house or ship, but the character and quality of the act is the same. It is a mere calculation and the application of a principle which is applied in the daily business of the people to every transaction of barter and sale, viz: What did the thing cost in labor and money, and what, under all the circumstances, is a fair profit on that investment in labor and in money?

Mr. President, it does not seem to me necessary to greatly elaborate the arguments in favor of the constitutionality of the powers conferred upon the Commission by the bill under consideration, because, in addition to the reason of the thing, which I think clearly sustains the power, in my judgment the Supreme Court of the United States has decided the identical question at issue in favor of the power in what is known as the "Mississippi case."

I admit the plausibility of the contention that the powers of the States over this question are broader than those of the General Government, but I confidently believe that argument is essentially unsound and untenable. It is true, as contended, that whatever powers the General Government has over this subject are derived from its powers to regulate commerce between the States, and that this power of regulation is confined to commerce.

What is and what is not commerce has been the subject of judicial discussion and decision since the beginning of the Government. The Supreme Court has made many deliverances upon the subject. In the interpretation of no provision of the Constitution, except, perhaps, the general-welfare clause, has this court shown a greater disposition to give to it an intendment which would meet the exigencies of new and uncontemplated conditions than in its interpretation of the clause under discussion. It has held that navigation is commerce and that all the instrumentalities and agencies of transportation, whether by rail or water, are commerce.

It is inconceivable to me that the thing which is transported from State to State and that the vehicles in which it is conveyed are commerce, subject to the regulating control of the Government in the interest of the people, but that the price exacted for the service of transportation is not commerce subject to the regulating control of the Government in the same interest. Mr. President, the commodities in which men traffic, the things which they buy and sell and exchange, constitute the corpus, so to speak, of commerce; but, sir, the life and soul of commerce is the profit accruing from the sale and exchange of commodities.

Figuratively speaking, profit is the center around which all commerce revolves. It is the power which brings commerce into being and sustains it. Where it begins, commerce begins; where it ends, commerce ends.

Now, the profits of commerce depend in some cases entirely, in many cases largely, and in all cases to a more or less degree upon the price of transportation. This is true to a certain extent of all commerce not purely local, but it is especially true of all commerce between widely separated sections. The Supreme Court has never held, and I can not believe it will ever hold, that the Government may regulate, in the interest of the people, everything connected with commerce except the thing out of which commerce originates, except the thing which created it, which sustains it, and which is to it the very breath of life.

If Congress has the power to fix and regulate charges of transportation of interstate commerce at all—and I do not doubt that it has—its powers in this regard, though they be delegated powers, are both exclusive and plenary, and there is nothing to differentiate them from the powers of the several States over domestic traffic, unless there is a difference in constitutional provisions affecting them.

If therefore, Mr. President, the power of the legislature of Mississippi to fix rates on domestic commerce through a commission was presented and decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case I have referred to from that State, this decision is direct authority upon the question now under consideration, unless the provisions of its constitution affecting the power of its legislature over rates are at variance with like provisions of the Federal Constitution. The only provisions of the Federal Constitution, except the commerce clause, which I have already discussed, affecting the exercise of that power in the manner proposed in this bill is the provision with reference to the separation of the coordinate departments of the Government and the provisions guaranteeing equal protection of the laws, and that private property shall not be taken without due process of law, unless the preferential-port clause applies, and I do not think it does, though I shall not now attempt a discussion of that question.

I have examined the constitution of Mississippi, and I find no substantial difference between it and the Constitution of the United States in the several respects enumerated. It provides, as does that of the United States, for the separation of the coordinate branches of the Government; it guarantees, as does the Constitution of the United States, the equal protection of the laws, and it provides, as does the Federal Constitution, against taking of private property without due process of law.

An examination of the decision rendered by the Supreme Court in the case referred to, known as "Stone v. The Farmers' Loan and Trust Company," reported in 116 United States, pages 307–347, shows that the question of the power of the State of Mississippi to fix and regulate rates through a commission was presented to the court and a decision rendered affirming the power.

This case arose out of a proceeding instituted by the railroad named to enjoin a rate fixed by the railroad commission of that State, under the act of the legislature of the State conferring upon it rate-making powers. In the statement of the case Chief Justice Waite gives in numerical order the contentions advanced and relied upon by the railroads. He states the one pertinent to the issue under present discussion in the following terms:

> Fourth. That it [meaning the Mississippi statute] confers both legislative and judicial powers on the commission, and is thus repugnant to the constitution of Mississippi.

After answering the several antecedent contentions of the railroad, he disposes of the fourth contention as follows:

> 4. The supreme court of Mississippi has decided in the case of Railroad Commission v. Yazoo and Mississippi Railroad Company, and Railroad Commission v. Natchez, Jackson and Columbia Railroad Company, not yet officially reported, that the Mississippi statute is not repugnant to the constitution of the State "in that it creates a commission and charges it with the duty of supervising railroads." To this we agree, and that is all that need be decided in this case. (166 U. S., 336.)

To the same effect is the decision in the case of Reagan v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company (154 U. S., p. 392). This was a proceeding to enjoin an order as to rates made by the Railroad Commission of Texas under an act of the legislature of that State conferring on it that power over rates of carriers. The Supreme Court of the United States, speaking through Justice Brewer, says, after discussing a preliminary jurisdictional question:

> Passing from the question of jurisdiction to the act itself, there can be no doubt of the general power of the State to regulate the fares and freights which may be charged and received by railroads or other carriers, and that this regulation can be carried on by means of a commission. Such a commission is merely an administrative board, created by the State for carrying into effect the will of the State as expressed by its legislation.

Mr. President, while the decision in the maximum rate case, reported in 167 United States, and decided in 1896, probably does not, strictly speaking, decide anything except that the Commerce Act of 1887 did not confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission power to fix a future rate, yet it is impossible to read that decision without feeling that the court meant to concede the power of Congress to confer upon the Commission this authority had it used language adequate for that purpose. A few extracts from that decision will suffice, I think, to confirm this statement. In speaking of the powers of Congress over the subject of transportation charges and the regulation by it, Justice Brewer used this language:

> There were three obvious and dissimilar courses open for consideration. Congress might itself prescribe the rates, or it might commit to some subordinate tribunal this duty; or it might leave with the companies the right to fix rates, subject to regulations and restrictions, as well as to that rule which is as old as the existence of common carriers, to wit, that rates must be reasonable.

Then the court, through Justice Brewer, proceeds to discuss the question of whether Congress had used language sufficient to confer this power over future rates upon the Commission, and in that connection observes:

> The language by which the power has been so often used and was so familiar to the legislative mind is capable of such definite and exact statement that no just rule of construction would tolerate a grant of such power by mere implication. Administrative control over railroads through boards or commissions was no new thing. It had been resorted to in England and in many of the States of this Union. It will be interesting to notice the provisions in the legislation of different States.

Then follows a recital of the language employed in many State statutes in conferring this power, with significant comments upon Congress's failure to employ any of these or any language of similar import.

The irresistible conclusion from this discussion is that the court conceded, though it may not have decided, that Congress possesses control over charges of common carriers and that it could commit that power to the Interstate Commerce Commission, but that it had failed to do so in the act of 1887, because it had not employed language fit and appropriate to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. President, railroads are in their nature monopolies, but as long as these monopolies were independent of each other competition between them was sufficient to protect the people against monopolistic charges. The consolidation in recent years of practically all of our railroads into a half dozen systems or groups, which have partitioned the whole country between them, has brought every citizen in the nation face to face with a gigantic entity, possessed with power to levy tribute upon his earnings such as no feudal sovereign of the middle ages ever possessed and such as no civilized government of to-day possesses. Acting under an unmistakable mandate from the people, the Congress and the courts have been active in their efforts to break the power and the hold of these monopolies over the people and to prevent their further extension.

Despite these joint efforts the process of monopolization has from year to year gone steadily on, and the hold of the monopoly has been strengthened rather than weakened. It may be possible, under constitutional limitations, to dissolve and prevent these consolidations, but the way and the method to accomplish that result have not yet been discovered, and there are those who doubt the adequacy of any legislation to this end which is not in itself dangerously radical or subversive of principles held to be fundamental in our political structure.

Mr. President, if neither Congress nor the courts can effectually dissolve and prevent these monopolistic combinations, Congress can, by the exercise of its admitted powers over interstate commerce, at least render ineffectual the main purpose of their organization. The power of Congress under the Constitution to do this is ample, and the method simple and effective. If the Government will employ its undoubted powers over charges of transportation to the extent of seeing that unjust and unreasonable rates are not collected, the power for evil of these overgrown combinations will be effectually neutralized if not wholly destroyed. Why should not Congress employ this power, at least to the limited extent proposed in this bill? We know that the people are behind the futile laws we have passed to dissolve, prevent, and punish these illegal combinations. Why, then, should we doubt that the people will approve and applaud effective legislation to defeat their sinister and unlawful purposes?

Why should Congress hesitate? Railroads are creatures of the law, created primarily to serve the public. In assuming such control no right of the railroads, grounded either in law or contract, will be violated, since the reserved right of the Government to fix rates, either partially or wholly, is as much a part of the law creating them as if it were expressly written in the charter authorizing their incorporation. If they are now fixing these rates without interference from the Government, it is not by virtue of an exclusive right, but by way of privilege and at sufferance. It is not, therefore, a question of right, but a question of policy which confronts us—a question of whether the exigencies of the situation require, in the interest of the public, that these privileges should be circumscribed.

Mr. President, the evils of which the people complain are militant and tangible; they exist in the experience and knowledge of every man whose business interests are affected by excessive transportation tolls. The complaints which fill the press and which come to us in countless petitions, memorials, and resolutions are based upon statements within the knowledge and experience of the complainants as to things that have happened and are happening every day under the system which Congress is asked to change. These complainants come to us and say: "Here is an evil, portentous and all-pervading, and here is the remedy. You have the power to apply the remedy, a power given you in trust for our benefit; we demand that you use it."

On the other hand the railroads who resist this legislation and insist that the people who created them and who support them shall have no share in fixing the tolls and exactions which they are required to pay, come to Congress with arguments and theories; with deductions and prophecies not based upon actualities; not based upon what has been and what is, but upon statements of their belief and fears of what will result to their interest and that of the country from this legislation. For my part I think it is safer to act upon facts than upon theories, upon actualities than prophecies, upon conditions existant than upon conditions predicted—predicted conditions which have never in our experience resulted from similar causes and will not probably happen in the future.

Mr. President, the past is certain, the present is reasonably so, the future is nebulous; but it is a darkness illumined by streaks of light, reflected from our experience in the past and the present. There is nothing in this experience to admonish us against this legislation, but much to cheer the hope of the people that it will afford relief from conditions which now handicap with unequal exactions the industry and commerce of the country.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, when I gave notice yesterday that I would follow the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] in the discussion of the pending bill, I was under the impression, from the notice contained in the Calendar, that the Senator from North Carolina would commence his speech at the conclusion of the routine morning business. Instead of that he did not commence until 2 o'clock; it is now nearly 4 o'clock; and for that reason I do not feel warranted in going on this afternoon with such remarks as I desire to submit.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. FORAKER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 14, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 13, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee on the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 16472, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I desire to state to the House I will not at this time ask for any limitation on the time for debate. Many requests have come for time. There are some broad propositions in the bill which probably will call for considerable debate, so I will delay until some future time to ask that limit be set upon general debate. I now renew my motion.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I have no objection to that proposition if the gentleman will let the debate go on on all fours on both sides of the House.

Mr. LITTAUER. Certainly.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 16472—the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the first formal reading of the bill be omitted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be omitted. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill as presented to the House makes provision for the annual salaries of 14,406 public officials. It carries appropriation in all of $29,134,181. The annual Book of Estimates as submitted to Congress called for appropriation in connection with this bill of $447,000 increase over the bill of last year. The bill we present to you is $1,135,572 less than the estimates, or, in other words, $688,000 less than is carried in the bill for the current year.

The Departments have asked for an increase of force of one hundred and seventy-one. The bill carries two hundred and thirty-two less than was submitted to us, or a decrease of force of sixty-one.

Mr. Chairman, it requires much more than a cursory examination of a bill of this character, regulating the salaries of the entire governmental service, to appreciate the hundreds of details it contains. In fact, your committee after weeks of labor on the bill has been unable to consider each one of its many details. We must necessarily be guided in large measure by the detail of former appropriation bills and consideration of the various submissions of the Book of Estimates—submissions for increase of force, increase of compensation, and for new projects. We have, however, in late years had frequent occasion to refer to many facts to demonstrate that the annual estimates were often prepared with less care and scrutiny than they deserved. The estimates come to us through the heads of Departments, the Secretaries of the President's Cabinet, whose many duties, establisheed by law and by custom, take up so much of their time that it seems impossible for them to enter into details which they submit to us. The result is that in general practice they are compelled to rely upon statements, estimates, and submissions of their bureau chiefs, as we have to depend upon theirs.

The result of this custom is that in matters of submission of estimates the bureau chief is in reality supreme and soon grows into the habit of thinking he ought to be supreme. So that, if, in the course of events, the Secretary sees fit to eliminate any of his estimates, to cut them down or to cut them out in part, or if the judgment of Congress, as declared in its appropriations, takes a like course, the gentlemen at the head of these bureaus seem to have taken it upon themselves to study out means and methods of drawing from the general appropriations—the indeterminate appropriations—for their departments and bureaus such sums as in their own good judgment are necessary to carry out the purposes of their bureaus as they believe they ought to be carried out. Their impulse, as is generally stated, is that they seek to carry on the necessary work of their bureaus as they believe it ought to be carried on. The system has resulted in placing the opinion of the bureau chief over that of his superior officer; it negatives the action of Congress, and leads, as we have frequently demonstrated in this bill, to a diversion of public funds and extravagant expenditure, thwarting the purpose of Congress, paying higher salaries, bringing about abuses in promotion, and applying funds intended for one purpose to the accomplishment of others.

Your Committee on Appropriations has sought in this bill to limit every diversion of public funds from the exact purpose for which they were appropriated, and if gentlemen will examine the report accompanying the bill, they will find that we have placed many limitations on the expenditure of appropriations. For instance, in the State Department we have placed a limitation on the use of the emergency fund given to the President for the emergencies in the diplomatic service, used for clerk hire in the Department in Washington. In the War Department we have limited the use of general appropriations for the detail of civil officers and clerks to bureaus in the Department from other branches of the service in the District of Columbia.

In the Navy Department we found contingent expenses in the bureaus were drawn not only from the contingent fund of the Department, but from the general appropriations for the bureaus and for the increase of the Navy. We intend to put a stop to that practice. In the Treasury Department we found an appropriation for the restoration of old rolls and vouchers. All the old ones seem to have been restored. The fund was used to supplement the clerks in the various bureaus of the Department, and we have omitted that appropriation. And then we took it upon ourselves to wipe out every lump-sum appropriation that we could get at. We found that certain forces had been provided for year after year, as, for instance, in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, forces that were devoted to the executive work of that office; we took them over and specifically provided for them. In the Office of the Supervising Architect there was a like condition. Gentlemen all know that about 5 per cent is drawn from the appropriation made for new buildings and applied to work of design and engineering for draftsmen and clerks here in the Supervising Architect's Office. We took over as much of that force as seemed to us to be permanent. We have covered into this bill specifically every force that we could get at, carried by lump-sum appropriation. There were a few in regard to which we felt that it was not yet the proper time to appropriate specifically, and notably the administrative force of the Government Printing Office, concerning the work of which we held elaborate hearings, but found that the Public Printer, recently appointed to that office, had not yet such comprehensive idea of the work and had not yet begun the elimination of the force that was necessary to properly conduct the office, and hence was not able to advise us in reference to specific salaries for the necessary force.

It is becoming gradually more and more difficult for us to ferret out what is going on in the Departments. Our hearings lasted for weeks, extending over 700 pages in the pamphlet before you. The fact is constantly before us that we should have at our service some sort of aid which would examine into the expenditure after the appropriation has been made, so as to get at the facts in the bureaus of what is actually taking place there in order to control with fullest intelligence appropriations for the future. The machinery provided by Congress for the examination of accounts and expenditures, of economy, justness, correctness of expenditures, of conformity with appropriation law, of retrenchment, abolishment of useless offices, of the reduction and increased pay of officers is evidently not in working order; at any rate, some gear is out of place which needs looking after by the engineers in charge. Without some aid from those who have made examinations of the actual conduct of expenditures in the bureaus your Committee on Appropriations probes away, in the ascertaining of these facts, largely in the dark. We follow up leads which come to us through rumors or through our own experience and casual observation. Our efforts in forming such an appropriation bill as this toward getting at necessary facts can amount to nothing but a scratch on the surface, astounding though such revelations scratched up actually are. The diversion of appropriations, setting aside the will of Congress, despite such limitations as we place upon expenditure to prevent the diversion of funds intended for one purpose to the accomplishment of another, will go on unless we can provide active and live means for greater scrutiny and vigilance over the operation of the Departments. Actual violations of the law can not be charged, but the intention of Congress is constantly thwarted by unauthorized use of its appropriations, diverted through the study of various appropriation bills to find the technical right for the diversion of funds.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the consideration of a bill of this character naturally leads us to an examination of the conditions we find in the public service, and we have this year been greatly impressed by many serious consequences—matters that have grown worse in the course of time in connection with the appointment, the methods of promotion, and the tenure of office.

Mr. Chairman, I want first to call the attention of the committee to what to-day seems to be an absolute necessity—a reclassification of the Government service for the purpose of establishing the principle that like work should receive like pay. To-day we find forces of men receiving salaries at $900, at $1,000, at $1,200, and even at $1,800 a year performing exactly the same work. This is most demoralizing to the force and works detriment. It is as unjust as it is unfair. Unjust to the man who performs the same work as his neighbor and at a lower salary, and unfair in the distribution of the public funds. We find by our system of promotion that a clerk working at one time at a thousand dollars will perform just the same work when thereafter, in the course of years, he has been promoted to $1,200 or $1,400, or to a compensation of $1,800 per year. Such a system of promotion is manifestly wrong. I do not see how we can reform these matters in our appropriation bill. I feel that there ought to be appointed a commission of the two Houses of Congress to consider this subject of inequality of pay and the subject of the methods of promotion, and the causes why in one Department a larger force is required to accomplish the same result as a much smaller force in another Department.

It seems to me that we ought to have a commission to consider these problems with power to report their recommendations with every privilege. If we do not take some action, the inequality of compensation will continue to grow from year to year until its growth will be a serious detriment to the proper conduct of our Departments.

Mr. Chairman, the Government offers a very attractive field of occupation in its service. Our salaries, especially those in the ordinary clerical force, are not only generously liberal, but even extravagantly high in comparison with what is paid throughout the country. I make bold to say that if the conduct of our service could be the same as that which obtains in the great manufacturing and trading concerns of the country, in the railroads, such as the New York Central or the Pennsylvania Railroad companies, that the service of the Government could be conducted by three-fourths of the force now employed and at practically little more than half its cost. Our salaries are higher, our hours of work are less, our leaves of absence with pay are longer, our holidays are more frequent, and the relative productive gait at which our clerks work is decidedly lower, with the result that the wide-open doors of our public service, barred only by an examination for competency, are always crammed jam full with numerous applicants. Once inside the doors, safely within the public service, those not blessed with more than the usual ambition or independence remain until death makes a vacancy in their positions. Under the operation of civil-service regulations, with its wide-open door at the entrance, there is no other outlet, except by resignation, than a door wide enough to let a coffin through. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, our conditions are daily growing worse, until the time has come when we must devote our best endeavors to correct this state of affairs. With the right of continuous tenure in office must go the demand that the clerk remain competent. When through any infirmity, mental or physical, he is no longer competent to deliver an equivalent for his salary, he must make room for those able to do so. Our Government is no charitable institution.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LITTAUER. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I should like to inquire of the gentleman in charge of this bill, and whose statement is very interesting, if there is no power anywhere to get rid of an incompetent clerk?

Mr. LITTAUER. There is. The law makes ample provision for getting rid of an incompetent clerk to-day, but I was just about to comment on the fact that the law is never carried out.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Can you make a law that will be lived up to?

Mr. LITTAUER. I believe we can make provision that would eliminate incompetent and incapacitated employees.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Would it not be a good idea to eliminate some of the people who refuse to obey the law?

Mr. LITTAUER. It would be, and they are the heads of bureaus and heads of Departments, who seem to be overcome with sympathy.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. And are some of them in the same class?

Mr. LITTAUER. And many of them are in the same class. But, Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, this Government is not a charitable institution. Our Departments must not be turned into homes for the aged and infirm. We must demand that our clerks continue competent, and we must find means of getting rid of those who prove that they are not competent. For years this House has included a provision in this very bill declaring that no appropriation carried in the bill should be applicable to the payment of the salary of an incapacitated clerk; but when our bill reaches another body we find insistence there that this incapacity must be "permanent" incapacity, or it must be incapacity "other than temporary." Then the administration of the law falls into the hands of the heads of the Departments and the heads of the bureaus, and these gentlemen declare that they are not gifted with divine foresight, that they can not tell whether the incapacity of the day, in the case of any clerk, will not be cured at a future day. They say they can not tell whether the clerk stricken with paralysis may not at some future day be drawn out of his trouble. Consequently the law is nothing but a dead letter.

It was never the intention of Congress that tenure in the civil service should be for life, but only during efficiency, and yet the action of these heads of Departments and heads of bureaus, permitting their sympathies to carry them away, has evidently thwarted the intention of Congress. While appointment to office is no longer the spoil of the victorious partisan, retention in office has become the spoil of the incapacitated clerk.

Mr. DALZELL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LITTAUER. Certainly?

Mr. DALZELL. This law imposes on the heads of Departments the duty of discharging an incompetent clerk. Is there any penalty attached for the violation of that law?

Mr. LITTAUER. There is none.

Mr. DALZELL. Is a law of any account that has no penalty attached to it?

Mr. LITTAUER. Well, it seems not.

Mr. DALZELL. Is it out of the power of Congress to attach a penalty that would make that law effective?

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not believe it is out of the power of Congress to attach such a penalty. The difficulty would come to frame a law that would be applicable with justice and then be effective.

Mr. DALZELL. It seems to me it would be very easy.

Mr. LITTAUER. There are extreme cases, no doubt, that can be made applicable to a general law, but the nice question, whether or not a man is capacitated or incapacitated is one that it seems to me would be somewhat difficult to make subject to exact provisions of a general law.

Mr. DALZELL. Can you remedy it by making a hard and fast rule which says that a man of a certain age is incompetent, although he may have been one of the best clerks in the Department?

Mr. KENNEDY of Ohio. That is the exception, however.

Mr. LITTAUER. That is one of the exceptions, however, that we believe proves the rule. The remedy we propose will eliminate a large and important proportion of the incapacitated.

The able chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has conducted a thorough inquiry, with his usual diligence and energy, and with the very patriotic purpose of benefiting the service alone, as to the number of clerks now in the service here in the District of Columbia——

Mr. PRINCE. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. LITTAUER. Certainly.

Mr. PRINCE. The gentleman was talking a moment ago about the age limit.

Mr. LITTAUER. I am about to come to that in particular.

Mr. PRINCE. If an amendment is suggested that the Union soldiers and the widows of Union soldiers of the civil war and the soldiers and widows of other wars shall not be subjected to the restrictions of the age limit, would not that be a proper amendment?

Mr. LITTAUER. I think I had better not answer that question at this time, but take it up when the discussion on the measure itself comes to that point.

Mr. PRINCE. I suggest to the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, that such an amendment may be offered when the time comes.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I shall address myself to an amendment of that kind when it may regularly be offered. I wish to state that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], has by his investigations found out that there were in the Departments here in the District of Columbia 1,687 clerks over 65 years of age, and that their annual compensation averaged $1,235; that 586 of them were 70 years of age and older, and that their compensation averaged $1,243. The almost universal testimony from superior officers is that this great number of superannuated clerks makes necessary a much greater number of employees to perform the work. Secretary Taft, Secretary Bonaparte, Secretary Root were all pronounced in their statements on this point. Secretary Hitchcock declared that if the old clerks could be eliminated from his bureaus he could get along with a force 25 per cent smaller. Now, what does that mean? Every one of us is against a civil pension law. It is antagonistic to our ideas from every standpoint, and yet the retention in the service under the civil-service regulations of these old clerks makes out of our civil service a civil pension list. The clerks themselves realize this fact even more than do Members of Congress. They see day after day people in their own divisions rendering little or no equivalent for the salaries they receive from the Government. To-day they are constantly holding meetings asking men of distinction and experience to provide for them some means whereby they can ward off the consequences that they see coming.

They realize that the tree is dead at the top, and we ought to realize that it is our duty to cut off the dead branches. We must prevent the development of the civil-service system into a civil pension list. We can not legislate except for the average. We can not take up the exception. We must by positive provision of law, not subject to any departmental action, stop the retention in the public service of those partially or wholly incapacitated. Every one of us knows that when the average human being reaches the age of 65 years his abilities in part at least are impaired, and that in the Government service it is but fair that the salary one of 65 years of age should receive should not exceed a certain fair compensation. We have recommended in this bill that hereafter those 65 years of age shall not receive salaries over $1,400, and that when the years go on—and naturally the average man's capacity grows less during those years—and he reaches 68 years of age he shall not receive a salary of over $1,200, and at 70 years of age his salary shall be no more than $840. Moreover, we add the provision that after six years following this fiscal year, after June 30, 1913, there shall be no employee in the Government service over 70 years of age.

The caricatures of our proposition in the local press have been most amusing and very descriptive, and yet what right to compare a force maintained permanently in office with a force that is eliminated every two years or every six years by election, appointment, or otherwise? Such comparison is as unfair as it is ridiculous. I trust Members will realize that the operation of our civil-service laws has now brought us to a point where we must take some action to get rid of the incapacitated; and after full deliberation your committee see no other way than to eliminate at least that number of incapacitated clerks who naturally become incapacitated by the lapse of years.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to return to the consideration for a moment of the unequal salaries paid. It is but natural that the organization of the Houses of Congress should be taken as an example to pattern after by the Departments, yet nowhere in the Government service is there more inequality of compensation than here under our own control. We of the House note that there is a body here of ninety members. They are attended by 372 specified salaried attendants, whose salaries amount to $534,000. Add to that their stenographers, at $25,000, and then a miscellaneous fund, for which in the year 1906 $150,000 has already been appropriated, nearly all of which is expended for annual salaries.

Add to these amounts $104,000 for general expenses, and we find a total expenditure for every Senator outside of his salary and mileage of about $9,000. Then we turn to this House of 386 Members and 4 Delegates. There are 432 specified salaried attendants receiving practically the same amount as the 372 of the Senate, $535,000; in addition there is the annual clerk to each Member, costing $466,000, to which must be added our general expenses of $153,000, which makes the cost for each Member of Congress, outside of his salary and mileage, $3,000. The individual Senator is thus fully three times as expensive as the Member of the House. The inequality in compensation is emphasized by the compensation to the working forces of the two Houses. The committee clerk there receives $2,220, whereas we pay the same officer $2,000. The annual clerk is paid at that end of the Capitol $1,500 a year, whereas we pay him $1,200.

The Senate messenger receives $1,440; we pay ours $1,200, $1,100, and $1,000, and pay our janitors $720 (who in part do the same kind of work). When we come to consider the working forces we find that their chief engineer receives $2,100, ours $1,700, their assistants $1,440, ours $1,200, and so on down through the force. Now, we know perfectly well we have no right to control, we can not control, any expenditure at that end of the Capitol, but we have the right to control the expenditures in connection with this House. We find in the organization about this House inequalities of pay in the force just as great as elsewhere, even in forces doing exactly the same character of work. We felt it was our duty to begin a reform here at home in order that there might be an example before the Departments, with their thousands of clerical force unequally paid like our own.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman be willing to yield for a moment?

Mr. LITTAUER. Certainly.

Mr. LAWRENCE. While you are on this matter of inequalities of salaries, I notice that you refer in your report to the fact that there are sixty Capitol police——

Mr. LITTAUER. I was about to come to that.

Mr. LAWRENCE. And that thirty of them get $1,100 and thirty get $960. Now, I would ask the gentleman if he will state if there is any law specifying the number of Capitol police and the salaries they shall receive.

Mr. LITTAUER. None, except the current appropriation law; consequently we have the right to deal with the force here, and it is our purpose to deal with it in this bill. The Capitol police is one of the three forces that the Committee on Appropriations, after much deliberation, determined to attempt to reform as far as compensation is concerned. We found that of the members of this police force thirty received $1,100, thirty received $960, and nine received $900, despite the fact, testified to by their superior officers and admitted by themselves, that the service of each one was the same as every other one. Appointments are not made to the $900 class with an increase after a lapse of time to $960 and $1,100. It would be impossible to follow out such a system of promotion in a force appointed on the basis of patronage. Appointments are actually made at $1,100, others at $960 and $900, without reference to experience. We felt it was a manifest injustice to the men doing the work to receive such unequal compensation, just as it is to the Members who recommend the appointments.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the reasons for this inexcusable inequality of compensation, not only with reference to the Capitol police, but in reference to all branches of the service here in the Capitol, is that we have not based our action upon general law, but have acted from year to year on appropriation bills?

Mr. LITTAUER. Such has been the case.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Will the gentleman permit a question? I notice in the hearings it was stated that there are twelve messengers in this House receiving a thousand dollars a year, twelve messengers receiving $1,200 a year, all doing precisely the same work. Now, may I ask the gentleman what was done with that proposition?

Mr. LITTAUER. Well, I would state to the gentleman that we attempt in this bill to be practical reformers in equalizing the pay of our forces. We attempt to do only what we could give good reasons for doing. We have made a beginning by equalizing three forces—the police force, the force in the folding room, and the force in the document room. When we attempted to take like action with the messenger force we found one force paid $1,200, a soldiers' roll at $1,200—and the soldiers' roll is usually considered sacred by us—and finally we find another force at a thousand dollars.

It is true that the compensation of all is most ample, yet some of these messengers unquestionably do work that requires better endeavor and greater intelligence than others. The messenger, for instance, at the main door performs much more work than one at the side door. We concluded to leave the messenger force as we found it. We did not take up the question of whether the compensation fitted the work or not. We felt if we attempted to do that we would be wiped out here on the floor.

We determined to average the compensation of the three forces, so that the total amount expended for these forces would be just slightly more than they are now receiving. We increase the total pay of the police force $480, of the folding-room force $340, and of the document-room force $200. We did not attempt to determine the reasonableness of the compensation. We felt from the very nature of their appointment and employment that we ought to follow the past action of Congress, who were much better able to determine what were proper salaries, than to place our own judgment upon the worth of the work.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Then, if I understand the gentleman, in regard to the reform of the messenger service, it was not regarded as inequitable, but as impracticable?

Mr. LITTAUER. That is it. It was plainly so. There is no other reason that we can give. The messenger service force, except with just this little difference that there is little more work done at one place than at another, should all be placed on one basis. If these equalizations we propose shall be adopted by the House, and the House gives its approval to this attempt to equalize salaries and give each man the same pay for the same work, we can subsequently attempt like action with other forces connected with the House.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. As I understand it, the pay of the messenger service in the Senate is uniform.

Mr. LITTAUER. The messenger service pay is uniform. They all receive $1,440 a year.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. A much higher salary and doing the same work?

Mr. LITTAUER. But we have no control over their salaries.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Why not follow the precedent of the Senate and equalize these salaries?

Mr. LITTAUER. If you ask my opinion, the salaries we already pay are too high for the work rendered.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will not comment further at this time on the provisions of the bill, but will wait until the various paragraphs of the bill give me the opportunity of stating to the committee the reasons for the many changes we have adopted in the bill, as well as the reasons for many omissions. [Applause.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, as I stated on this floor last winter on the adjournment of the Fifty-eighth Congress, these appropriation bills had not been scrutinized as they should have been, and that there was a great deal of looseness financially in the bureaus and the Departments that could not be uncovered and brought to the attention of this House unless the Appropriations Committee took a great deal more time as to details than we had been taking in the past. I then objected to the short session and object to it now. It amounts to nothing. And I am surprised that Members of Congress, especially those that have been here for quite a while, should be content to meet here on the 1st of December and adjourn on the 4th of March, with two or three weeks' holiday in the meantime. Your appropriation bills and other legislation is imperfect and, if you will excuse the expression, not very creditable to this House. It goes to the other end of the Capitol, and there, by some means or another, they spend a little more time. And it has gone out abroad if you want deliberate and safe legislation, you must go to the Senate; and perhaps that accounts for the $9,000 expenses per capita there against $3,000 here. It may have something to do with it. I hope and trust, Mr. Chairman, that you will lengthen the short session and that you will stop buying through tickets to Europe so early in the spring.

This committee, if you will excuse me, Mr. Chairman, has given more pains and more time to this appropriation bill than has ever been given to it since I have been in this House—a period of sixteen years. What is the result? The gentleman who has just taken his seat has partially given you some idea of what we have done. And on one item alone—uniformity and fitness of salaries—it would take that subcommittee that made up that bill three long months to work it out. Do you intend ever to do it? Do you intend to have clerks sitting alongside of one another, one getting $1,800 a year, one getting $1,400 a year, one $900 a year, and one $720 a year, and doing exactly the same work? It is impossible to get discipline or to maintain discipline in a Department or a bureau with such discrimination. Our people are not slaves. They are not the yellow men of the Philippines. When a bright, sprightly young man is working for $720 a year, doing identically the same work and the same amount of work as a clerk who gets $1,800 a year, you can not expect to discipline that man.

There are a thousand ways in which he can get even with the Government without vacating his desk. There are hundreds of ways in which he can fritter away the time during the day without going out of the house. I repeat that it would take the subcommittee that made up the bill now pending three months this summer to work that problem out—inequality of salaries and the fitness of salaries to the work to be done. There was but little attention paid to it prior to this session. Let us take a few examples. I have a hundred of them. Here is one. The chief telegrapher in the War Department is an $1,800 clerk. He has four helpers, and two of them get $1,200 and two of them get a thousand annually. The Department of Commerce and Labor has a chief telegrapher at $1,200 a year, which is $600 less than that given to the chief telegrapher of the War Department. He has two helpers at $1,000. They are $200 down from what the helpers receive in the War Department. The District government has three telegraphers at $1,000. There is $800 down. The Treasury Department has two only; one chief and one assistant at $1,200. There is $600 down. The House of Representatives have two at $1,200. There is $600 down from the highest paid clerk. In the Senate they have one at $1,500. The Government Printing Office has one at $4.50 a day. The Interior Department has a telegrapher at $1,000. The Navy Department has a telegrapher at only $1,000. Eight hundred dollars difference between men doing indentically the same work. We could produce 100 or 500 illustrations of this sort of inequality. These things ought not to be; and they would not be if this House should take longer time to do this work, and not thrust your committee inside a room and tell them that they must have a bill reported in a certain time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Certainly.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Does the chief telegrapher in the War Department get $1,800 and the chief telegrapher in the Navy Department get $1,100? Do I understand that to be the gentleman's statement?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. One gets $1,800 and the other $1,000, and your telegrapher gets $1,200.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I was referring to the chief telegraphers in the War Department and in the Navy Department.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. In the War Department he gets $1,800.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And in the Navy Department?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. In the Navy Department he gets $1,000; he must be chief, as there is only one.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Are the responsibilities of the telegrapher in the Navy Department equal to the responsibilities of the chief telegrapher in the War Department?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Why, certainly. What is the difference if a man works eight hours a day, and busy? He can not do any more work than any other man of the same capacity working eight hours a day.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The object of making these inquiries as to the several responsibilities of these telegraphers was to develop the fact that the chief telegrapher in the War Department must send and receive messages in cipher.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. He has four helpers.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I assume that the telegrapher in the Navy Department has some help.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. He has no helper at all. I would not be surprised, so far as that is concerned, that the conditions in either place would not differ much. I should suppose that the telegrapher in the Navy Department would send as many and receive as many messages in cipher as the telegrapher in the War Department, and perhaps more.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Just in a moment. I want to say to the gentleman who is making the inquiry that I only give this as an illustration. There are many others.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The gentleman has called attention to what appear to be certainly very glaring inequalities of compensation for services rendered. Have the facts referred to just become known to the Committee on Appropriations or have they known them for some time?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. In answer to the question, Mr. Chairman, let me tell the gentleman that they have come to our knowledge recently. We have known of a great many of these things, but we have not had an opportunity to bring them out fully until now.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Were they not brought to the knowledge of the committee before?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No; we had not the time. We are rushed into the committee room and ordered to report a bill out. The committee being limited must necessarily limit the investigation. We have only a limited time in which to do the work, and can not go into the details. This time we have done so to a greater extent.

Mr. LAWRENCE. You have had no more time this session than you have had any long session of Congress.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes; we have.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Let me ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, from the bland manner in which he asked that question, would it not indicate that this is the first information that he has had of this condition of affairs?

Mr. LAWRENCE. It is the first information I have had in such detail.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I supposed that it was a matter of common information.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. We have had some of this information in the committee before, but this is the first time that we have given specifications to the House.

Mr. LAWRENCE. This is the first time I have heard it in such detail.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make an inquiry. I understand that there is a commission which has been constituted by the Executive for the purpose of examining the various executive branches of the Government, simplifying the work, and economizing and arranging it on a better business basis.

Now, while I know nothing about it, I should like to inquire whether the gentleman knows that this commission, which I understand is composed of able and intelligent men, is taking into account the situation that the gentleman has described and whether that is in the purview of their investigations?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The Committee on Appropriations has seen nothing more from the Keep commission, I suppose, than gentlemen of the House or individuals have seen. We saw the report on the Public Printer and the report on the Secretary of Agriculture. I guess the gentleman saw the same. That is all that we have seen of it. The commission was not before the Appropriations Committee, and if there was any specific information drawn from that commission I am not aware of it, except what was published to the world. But, Mr. Chairman, we are not responsible for the Keep commission and neither can the Keep commission assume the duties of this House.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON. The gentleman from Georgia has just pointed out some very glaring instances of inequalities in the pay of men doing similar work. I should like to inquire whether the committee has made any provision for equalizing those salaries, increasing some and decreasing others?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. In the legislative bill?

Mr. JOHNSON. In this bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I thought I was explicit on that. As was stated in the remarks of the gentleman who last had the floor [Mr. LITTAUER], we undertook to level up and level down the Capitol police.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand that, but I am speaking——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. We did undertake to level up and level down the employees in the document room of the Capitol. What that will be worth will depend on what the other end of the Capitol determines to do about it later.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understood that from the gentleman from New York; but what I want to know is, what did you do about these telegraphers in the War Department and the Navy Department and the various Departments of the Government, whose pay is so unequal?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Let me answer, once for all, that the investigation opened up so much of that kind of discrimination or inequality of salaries of people doing the same work that we concluded to let them go. The gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. LITTAUER] and I indorse the suggestion that the House and the Senate should appoint a joint committee. If you do not wish to take that joint committee from the Committee on Appropriations, take it from the floor of the House and the Senate; but I want to suggest to you that our splendid chairman and the gentleman from New York, and other gentlemen on the Appropriations Committee who have gone into this to a great length, are better fitted to do it than anybody else. We stopped, knowing that we had not the time to conclude it. Your subcommittee and your Committee on Appropriations, with your chairman, were anxious to do it, but I have said to you that it will take three months to do it. Are you willing to sit here that time and send us facts and wait for results?

Mr. JOHNSON. Why, certainly; that is what we are here for.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Very well; we will meet you halfway on that.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. May I make another inquiry?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The gentleman says that the Committee on Appropriations have been endeavoring to level up or to compose the discrepancies in these salaries. Now, I have taken occasion to look through this report that is made by the committee, and if I have not made any mistake, I found that the committee have increased sixty-four salaries and decreased only seven. I should like to know——

Mr. TAWNEY. I will correct the gentleman from Maine, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The gentleman from Maine needs to be corrected.

Mr. TAWNEY. We have increased 104 salaries and decreased 64. The increase in the aggregate amounts to $16,930 and the decrease to $8,400. I will say further that this bill abolishes 308 places, amounting in the aggregate to $360,360.25, and has created 243 new places, with an aggregate compensation of $276,324, leaving a net decrease of $76,506.25.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I hope that is a complete answer to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I would only say that the basis of my suggestion was the report of the committee. I do not undertake to be very familiar with it.

Mr. TAWNEY. I have taken the bill item by item, in order to ascertain the exact number of places abolished, the number created, the increases provided for, and the decreases provided for, and the statement which I have given is an exact statement of the facts.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I shall not take the time of the committee, Mr. Chairman, but I have a report of the committee in my hand, and if I am able to make an analysis correctly it results in exactly what I suggest. I will hand that report to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], and when he has time I shall be glad to have him call my attention to it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I would state to the gentleman from Maine that if the statement of the chairman of the committee needs any indorsement I very gladly give it.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I would be very glad to hand this report to the gentleman who now has the floor, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON]. All I desire is information. I have not gone through the bill, because it is almost impossible for a man not familiar with the details to get exact information of details. I would be very glad to hand this to the chairman. I have no doubt the gentleman correctly states the information.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, perhaps there is no more important matter pending, financially at least, than the question that is now being discussed before the House, but I desire to state that your Appropriation Committee could not very well level up these salaries and make them fit to work in five or six weeks. That is something that will take three months to do. If it is ever done it ought to be well done. We have begun it in the House as an example, and we determined to urge upon this House the necessity of it. We do not want to go abroad into the Departments and bureaus and spring it there. We sprung it in the House, and we begun to level up and level down in the House, and it ought not to stop there. I desire to say now that we had not the time to do it as well as we would wish, but it ought to be done.

The demoralization mentioned by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] is far broader and deeper and far more reaching than any Congressman has an idea of unless he be familiar with these bureau and Department clerks. It ought to be a disturbing element, and it ever will be; you never can get the full amount of work out of a boy sitting down working for $840 a year while a clerk who is beside him receives $1,800 a year for exactly the same work and no more of it. It is not right.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman this question: Is it true that clerks are now receiving $1,800 for precisely the same kind of work at the same desk they received last year, say, $1,000 for, or some less amount?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I was told the other day that there were clerks receiving $480 for doing the identical work that $1,800 clerks do.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, if my colleague will permit me, I desire to state to the committee, for the information of Members, that there is one branch of service, comparatively new, that we found where this inequality in compensation for identically the same service was found, and we have corrected it. That was in the telephone service. Some of the operators were receiving compensation at the rate of $400 and $500 a year and some as high as $1,200 a year. We have fixed a uniform compensation of $60 a month to all.

Mr. JOHNSON. Was that an increase or a decrease?

Mr. TAWNEY. That makes in the aggregate a decrease.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That ought to have been done all along the line, but we had not the time to do it. It was our disposition to do it.

Mr. Chairman, in our investigations in the hearings, we discovered the want of intimate knowledge of details on the part of the heads of Departments and the chiefs of bureaus and chief clerks. Now, no man engaged in any business enterprise, whether for Congress or on the outside, ever did succeed in managing employees and clerks unless he kept in touch with their affairs, unless he understood the details of his business and attended to it in detail. I regret to say that there are too many heads of Departments, too many chiefs of divisions, and too many chief clerks who know but little about their business. They ought to comprehend the business in detail. They ought not to think they can do the business in shipshape with a full day's work one day and but a part of a day's work the next day. There ought to be less politics, if you will pardon me, engaged in by these people, and more business done. I think that the clerks and employees in Washington have done and are doing remarkably well with the kind of management that they have.

Mr. CHANEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Georgia if his investigation has not disclosed the necessity for having some sort of a commission to take up this general subject and make a report to Congress?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, both the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] and myself have so stated.

Mr. CHANEY. I was not in the House at the time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Our opinion was that it would take a subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee or some other commission—and I dislike that word "commission"—some committee of the House and the Senate three months to do this work.

Mr. Chairman, we discovered another thing that ought not to be, and yet it is human nature, and you can not prevent it. The different Departments and bureaus wish to excel one over the other. Take the Navy Department and the War Department as illustrative, and when that spirit is abroad they forget the financial end of the thing, the revenue end of it, and their rivalry leads to extravagance. Therefore it behooves your committee to go into these matters, and they should be gone into in detail. It is a laudable motive to have, perhaps, the best equipment of guns on land or on ship, to have the best fortifications that the world ever had, and to have the best ships and the best-manned ships the world ever saw; but you have to hold that spirit in check or there will be extravagance world without end. Your committee in making up this bill discovered much of that, and in many cases lopped off and put up the bars in the face of those who were spending this money, so it could not be done again; but there are many, many instances of it remaining where valuable work could be done. This lump-sum business, Mr. Chairman, was touched on by the gentleman from New York, and it has been a great source of extravagance. It has been a great source of dissatisfaction. It is not the way to appropriate money. The Congress of the United States ought to have the expenditures in detail at the end of its fingers. The administration of affairs and the raising of revenue must go together, and a man who undertakes and thinks he can administer without comprehending and covering the finances in detail will be a bankrupt in his business on the outside. Of course he can not bankrupt this Government, because we can levy additional taxes, but it ought not to be done.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. In that connection, what has your committee to recommend in reference to appropriation and expenditure of contingent funds?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will not have time, but if you will just rest until we get on the bill in detail you will see that we have largely corrected this evil. Contingent expenses and lump sums are a flowing fountain of extravagance.

Mr. ESCH. I agree with you.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is all there is in it. Of course, by giving a man who spends the money that amount of latitude he can make the best show in the world. There is no doubt about that. But he goes far beyond what is practicable and valuable, and spends money for nothing, and when you put a contingent fund at his disposal or a lump sum without any restrictions you may expect extravagance, not from Mr. Jones or Mr. Smith, but from anybody. I am surprised that Congress does not stop it.

We have begun this time and are determined to stop it. We have made a great break in it, but it is not complete by any means. Take the Public Printer. When we come to discuss that part of this bill I invite you to be open and free and full. I have here some samples of work, and when we come down to the five-minute rule I will produce them. You take a few sheets of paper, largely statistics, furnished by the Public Printer to the Patent Gazette. They are paying $19,000 per annum for those few sheets of paper, and we had some parties go on the outside and see what it could be done for by Peters & Co., and they agreed to do it for $4,200. There is a difference between $19,000 and $4,200. I was informed this morning—and it is not in our hearings, and I call the attention of the chairman of the committee and Mr. LITTAUER to the fact—I was told this morning by an employee of that bureau who is a stereotyper that they charge exactly the same price for electrotyping work they do for stereotyping work, and stereotyping work costs only one-tenth of what the other does, but they put them up so as to make them even.

I do not want to make an unfair criticism against anybody or about anybody, but the truth of the business is in time past—and the present Public Printer is not responsible for these things; he is doing his best to reform everything down there, and I believe the man is honest and I believe he purposes to do it—it grew out of this fact that the head of that bureau did not know the details and did not comprehend the work before him. That is all there was in it. Why, the printing done for the Library by the Public Printer is done at enormously extravagant rates, as you will find here from the hearings, but 10 per cent of that was held back by the Public Printer for bookkeeping. That is an enormous per cent on that kind of work held back for bookkeeping.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not like to disturb the gentleman so often, but I would like to ask him a question. Are these prices that are received by the Government Printing Office from the various Departments turned into the Treasury, or what becomes of that money?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. You can not establish by the Appropriations Committee where the money goes. They are a law unto themselves. My answer to the gentleman is this: The Public Printer has been a law unto himself. He made his own estimates, he fixes his own salaries, he spends his own money, and I do not know who he accounts to for it; he does not account to Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It is not part and parcel of the Treasury Department; it is not part and parcel of any other Department or bureau of the United States Government. It has been a kind of independent business down there. [Laughter.]

Mr. PALMER. Does anybody audit his accounts?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. They are audited inside.

Mr. PALMER. Inside of what?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Inside of his bureau.

Mr. PALMER. Inside of the Printing Office?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Inside of the bureau; yes. I suppose they are audited inside.

Mr. PALMER. Does any Government auditor audit the accounts of the Public Printer?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will refer you to the Keep commission, my dear man. There we got more information than we have ever had from any other source. They reported on it.

Mr. PALMER. I only wanted to know whether there was an irresponsible guerrilla department that was not accountable to anybody.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to say once more that I think you will soon see a reformation there, and a very proper one, too.

Mr. PALMER. May the Lord hasten the day!

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, one of the most troublesome things we ran across was this old-age clause that we find in the bill. And when you come to tackle it you will find it to be the same thing—a hard question to settle. And I want to say, gentlemen, that it ought to be settled in justice and fairness to the clerks and to the Government. The question of whether an arbitrary rule fixing an age limit and calling that the dead line is fair or not I do not know. The clerks and chiefs of divisions and others involved in this question declare it is not fair. They say it requires discrimination. For instance, a man may be 70 years old sitting here and 70 years old sitting there, side by side, both at $1,800 a year. This man may be mentally twenty years younger than the other man, he may be physically much stronger than the other man, and they claim that we have made no discrimination or that we have. I want to suggest that when the time comes under the five-minute rule I am going to propose this as a substitute for what we have in that bill:

After June 30, 1906, and before November 1, 1906, the Civil Service Commission or a majority of the Commission shall visit each division in each bureau or office of each Department or governmental establishment in the District of Columbia for the purpose of examining every employee in the classified service over 65 years of age as to the efficiency and capacity of each to do a full day's work, and shall report to the second session of the Fifty-ninth Congress the exact condition of each employee, together with recommendation as to reduction or dismissal—

Based upon what?—

based upon his capacity mentally and physically to perform a good day's service. And the Appropriations Committee in making up its appropriation bills next thereafter—shall fix salaries or provide for reductions of force in accordance with this report. Such examination shall follow each year thereafter between June 30 and November 1, and shall be made by the Commission or a majority of the same, and not by details from their force. The efficiency record, the evidence of heads of Departments, of chief clerks, and chiefs of divisions, or any other accurate testimony, may be considered in arriving at a just conclusion affecting the value of services rendered by individuals, and to be reported hereunder.

Which will be next winter—

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, there is nobody under the broad heavens to-day that has so much time as the civil-service board. Everybody works but the board. [Laughter.] Now that is about all I want to say about that. The board has time to burn.

There is another reason why I want them to do this work. These people come in through that door, and it is the only door they can get in at, and there is none by which to get out. Let them go out at the door they came in. Why not? Why handicap a Congressman in his district? Why worry and trouble this House, trying to make a fair rule? We did that, and this clause that is already in the bill we thought, when we put it in there, was just and fair, while it was arbitrary. But they complain so bitterly about it, and the newspapers are objecting to it so strenuously, why not turn it over to this body and let them make a personal examination, not in their office, not away somewhere else, but right at the desk of the 65-year-old man, and make the investigation and report upon that man right there? There has to be a door by which to get these people out. There is no question about that. The gentleman from New York was correct. Standing on this floor fifteen years ago, when I was on the subcommittee making up the pension appropriation, I told you that you would regret the day if you procrastinated then in settling this question.

Civil Service Commission and civil pension are—one the cause, the other the effect; all the powers of earth and heaven can not divorce the two propositions. Whether we can do it or not is the question. [Great laughter.] But, Mr. Chairman, that is the question up to this House now. Can you do it? Can this House do it? Your committee tried it, and we have raised a hullabaloo over our heads. [Laughter.] Why, one gentleman said to me yesterday, "How old are you?" I replied, "74 on the 3d day of next April." And he said, "And you want to put out all the 70-year-old clerks without any examination, without any showing, without any discrimination?" I said, "Now, my dear man, will you agree to accept the road I travel?" He said, "Yes." "Well," I said, "there is an examination board down in my district every two years, and it is at my expense." [Cries of "Good!" "That is right!"] "Not only at my expense, but all the machinations and schemes that is possible to take the seat of a Congressman away from him are in play in most of our districts by those who want the places. Not in mine, thanks. We have got to bear the burden." I said, "Will you accept that?" He scratched his head and said, "I did not think about that." I said, "A man of 70 or 74 or 80 years in the House has, every two years, to go down to his district and to his constituency; and they pass on him." When I look around and see the men in the House now, there are scarcely a dozen men who were here when I first came. I do not think there are one dozen of those on the floor to-day who were here in the Fifty-second Congress, when I entered it. "Our constituencies," I told him, "my dear man, hold us to a stricter account than the Government has ever held you. Now, if you are willing to pass through that régime, I will put it on you. I will offer a substitute and have you examined every year if you are willing to stand for that." Then, he said, "Yes; when you put me on my merits, I am." This plan of mine puts him on his merit at his desk every year between June and November. Now, the question is, Will this civil-service board do fair and square between the clerks and Congress? I think they will, for this reason: They are not as popular in here as they ought to be now [laughter]; and if they shirk their duty one time you will see these gray-haired men and the young men, especially the bald-headed men, rising up and moving to gather their salaries from under them and abolish their powers. They can not afford to take the risk. They will not do it. I think the men on that board are good men, fair men, and they are sworn, remember, to perform the duties that Congress devolves upon them. I think they will do so.

Now, some one suggested that that was not as great a hardship upon the poor old clerk as the straight clause in the bill now pending. I think not. There is just one thing in our proposition in the bill that is lame. We make no difference between the men. When they get to be 65 or 70 they get a lower salary, and then finally go out, whether they are strong or weak, whether they are able or not. That is the point that they make such a complaint of; and I am inclined to think the complaint lies well; it is a point well taken. There are a great many of these men old soldiers. Now, the old soldiers on my side, we have them down in Georgia, and do the best we can, and thank God we have done fairly well by them. These old soldiers that were on the other side of that war, that are now in the bureaus and offices of the country, should not be turned out without sufficient cause, and should not be dropped if they can do a day's work. Under this plan, and under the one in the bill, when it is found that a man is unable to do eight hours' work and can do four hours', he is paid for four hours' work.

I know that every man on this floor agrees with the committee that the time will come, gentlemen, when you have got to handle this question. Fifty years from now, if it remains loose as it has been for forty years past, it will cost more money for civil pensions, three times over, than it does for your pensioners now. You have got to meet the question. Now, why can not we meet it as humanitarians? Why can not we meet it as sober, fair, just men, and if you are able to convince these clerks and these employees that we have done the just thing by them, why we will feel better by it, and they certainly will be satisfied.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, has the committee given any consideration to the proposition to have the civil-service rules applied to the admission of persons into the public service, have them serve for a specified time or term, and then go out and make their way in the world before they have reached the age when they are incapacitated to take care of themselves?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes; we have had that and fifty other plans before us, and let me just say to you now that your plan robs the Government of what it is properly and fully entitled to. A man comes in at 25. He is green. Because he comes in through the Civil Service Commission that does not necessarily mean that he knows one thing about his work. He may know how to measure a well, he may know how to measure a mountain, perhaps——

Mr. COCKRAN. I make the point of order that the committee is in such disorder that we can not hear the gentleman from Georgia.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the committee is in very good order, but the gentleman from New York is sitting a long distance away from where the gentleman from Georgia is standing.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will try to speak so that the gentleman from New York can hear me. I ask him to come down here.

Mr. COCKRAN. That would be disorderly, and it is because other gentlemen stand down in the center aisle that the rest of us can not hear.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, a man goes into the Government service in one of the Departments at the age of 25. He knows nothing whatever about clerical work there. He is put to work, and it takes a year or two to train him. By and by the chief or the chief clerk or somebody else gets him to be very exact. He is shrewd, he has a good brain, and above everything else he is willing to work; and it makes no difference what a man has in his head unless he is willing to work. He gathers the statistics of that division all up into his head. He can answer a question in a moment. He can refer to a book in a second, and can answer any question that may be asked with reference to the details of work in that department. See what a help that man is. Now, when he gets to be 50 years old he is just as bright; when he gets to be 60 years old he is just as bright, and by reason of his great knowledge and experience, is a vastly more valuable employee than when he came in at the age of 25. You want simply to rob the Government of that man's service, when he has received all his schooling and all his training right there, and has been well paid all the while to do it. Why not let him stay there as long as he is efficient, and let the Government have the benefit of his special knowledge and training?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I would protect him and the Government at the same time by letting him out while he is still capable of taking care of himself. Now, is it not true that in elective offices throughout the country men are elected for a term of two years to the office of register of deeds, county clerk, or county treasurer, where it is just as important that a man render accurate service to the people as in the public service here in Washington? There they serve for two years. If they have been faithful, they are elected for two years more, but rarely for a third time. Why not make a term, say, of six years, and have able young men and women coming in and going out constantly after a six-year term here in the public service? Then the question of a civil pension list will never worry the Government, and the question of having done injustice to an old employee who has given a lifetime of service to the Government will not be a matter of consideration here or elsewhere.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. My experience here in Washington on that point is that if you take a young man 25 years old and put him into the clerical force in Washington and keep him here twenty years he is not fit for anything else.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is to say, if you keep him here too long. Why not let him serve six years and then turn him out while he is able to do something else?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If he stays here twenty years, he has become unfit for any other employment.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But if he has stayed here six years he is still able to go out into the world and make a living.

Mr. LITTAUER. He will get the virus in six years.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The trouble is employees come here now and spend their whole salary, knowing that they have a life job with the prospect of a civil pension.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Under this plan of mine you put these clerks exactly where you put the Congressman and the clerk of a court. Every year between June and November that examining board visits that clerk, and they pass upon the question of his fitness. Every two years the clerk of a court or the ordinary of a county must submit to an examination or a contest for his place. Down our way we keep them until they die, if they are good clerks and good sheriffs and good ordinaries. We do not bother to change them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You reelect them; and then there are others just as competent never elected.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes; we have to reelect them; and this is a reelection that I propose. They come in through the civil service. Now, let the civil service come in and take care of their own children. They do not belong to us, I am sure.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman a few moments ago stated that when an aged employee of the Government got so that he could not do this work—only worked four hours, as he said—he is paid for these hours, and that after a while he "went out" of the public service. What is to become of him then?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. There are two propositions pending. The one in the bill is that in 1913, when this man is 70 years old, if he is living, he goes out on the grass without a penny from the Government. The proposition in this substitute of mine is that when the civil service says so he goes out, and if he goes out, he goes out without a penny from the Government just the same. Now, the only alternative to that is a civil pension. Is the gentleman from Tennessee in favor of that?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am not, and never have been.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. We are striving to do and are willing to do all that we can and the best that we can, and if you have got any better proposition we will accept it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will tell the gentleman why I object to that. The employee comes in voluntarily to the service. He spends all of his salary voluntarily, and stays in the service voluntarily when there are other people who would take his place, who are or may quickly become as competent as he is.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I know it, and if he was brought into a court-house, into a court of justice or a court of equity, and measured either by the law or by equity, I have no doubt the poor old clerk would go without anything. I know that he has not saved his wages, but I have no time to discuss that, and I have no disposition to do it, because it is a personal matter.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How about the civil service making it a life tenure? The employees have spent their salary, and spend it every month, knowing that they are in for life.

Suppose a Member of Congress—take the gentleman himself—say you retain your seat in Congress until you die of old age. Let us suppose he died without a cent, does he think Congress would be justified in paying his family a pension? I will take my own self. Does the gentleman think Congress would be justified in paying my widow, if I left one, a pension?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I do not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think that we should give employees, not elected but appointed for life, and serve until they wear out, simply because they can not do an hour's work in their old age, that we should pension them?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to state to the gentleman one vast difference between the clerk and the gentleman from Tennessee. The gentleman from Tennessee holds over his head a $5,000 policy guaranteed by the United States Government, and they haven't got that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I never heard of that before. It would be a pure gratuity, which I do not commend.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Suppose the gentleman dies to-day, the first minute we get a proper bill before the Appropriations Committee his widow, if he has got one—if you have a widow or a child, they would get that $5,000. Another thing that demoralizes the clerks, and they know about this insurance guarantee that the gentleman has over his head—another thing that demoralizes them is our conduct toward our retiring officers of the Army and the Navy. The man who is a captain and comes in line to be retired is promoted and made a colonel and serves the Government one day with an increased salary and is retired.

There are 434 retired brigadier-generals in this country now, and 407 of them can do service as well as they ever did. These clerks know it; they know our conduct toward these people, and they say if you can retire Army and Navy officers when they are young and able-bodied and intellectually as good as ever, why can not you have some consideration for the poor old clerks? I am not justifying their statement. I make the statements as they make them and leave them to you. I do not believe in a civil pension. We could not afford it. This Government is strong and rich, and I hope to heaven it will always be strong and rich, but we could not afford, with 390,000 employees and 10, 30, and 40 per cent of them going out every year at the age of 65 or 70—we could not afford to pension them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. As I understand, your time limit for these people to retire is 1913. In the meantime your proposed law would be operating as a notice that at that time all of the old people who are incapable of doing work will have to go out, and in the meantime they must save up something for that "rainy day."

Mr. LIVINGSTON. We are not telling them in detail what they shall do; we will leave them to read between the lines. They can read between the lines if this provision passes.

Mr. BRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Certainly.

Mr. BRICK. It is a fact that the committee and the subcommittee have looked over all sorts of conceivable remedies for this condition of affairs and that they have placed in the bill the one provision that they think is the most probable to be approved by the House. Now, these persons go out as they get old under this provision; and I would like to ask the gentleman if I am correctly informed that, in order to provide for old age and all of the varied burdens of life and work in Washington, the clerks and employees under the Government get from 25 to 100 per cent more than others in like employment outside of the city get?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is correct; but the gentleman will pardon me if I extend the answer and say that their expenses are 25 and 30 per cent more in Washington than they are elsewhere.

Mr. BRICK. We provide for that difference between outside employment and employment in Washington in ample remuneration.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Oh, I desire to say candidly—and I am not here to censure clerks for what they have done or have not done about their private matters, for I do not think it is proper that I should do it—I want to say candidly that is one of the great troubles. They have not saved.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest this, that the only way to settle this question of old clerks is to do it with individuals and not with a wholesale proposition. I can go into the other end of this Capitol, if you will excuse me, and find men there that are very active who are over 80 years of age, and I am not sure if one or two of them are not about 90. They do not give their age as freely as I give mine, but they are active and strong and vigorous, mentally and physically. One gentleman—and I do not mind putting in his name, for it is in the hearing—Mr. Ainsworth, who is a model man in his business, says that one of the best men he has is, I think it is, 76 years of age. I may be mistaken about stating the exact number of years, but I think he said 76. The only way to settle the question is with individuals; but I want to say in behalf of the committee, now, that we labored for weeks on this question and we had proposed to us perhaps fifty plans. I know that it was the purpose of your chairman and the members of that subcommittee, as well as the members of the committee itself when we came together, to do injustice to nobody if we could possibly help it; but we knew the fact that all rules have their exceptions and that all arbitrary rules work hardships to somebody. For that reason I endeavored to draw this to see at least if I could not have every man put upon his own merit, not on his age after he passes 65 years of age, and if that board will do him justice he will either stay in or go out with his mouth closed.

Mr. WATSON. Is not the plan now to deal with the individual in these Departments?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Oh, no. I am talking about our plan in the bill. If a man gets to be 70 years of age he drops down to a salary of $840 a year.

Mr. WATSON. The gentleman says that his proposition is to deal with the individual. Is not that the plan now in vogue in the Departments at this time?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Oh, well; let me say this to the gentleman——

Mr. WATSON. Is it not a fact that when an individual becomes incompetent that a Member of Congress can do nothing, because he has no assurance of getting the position himself for one of his constituents?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Oh, I think the gentleman is wrong about that.

Mr. WATSON. Is it not a further fact that when you talk about ousting a person because he is incompetent there is often influence behind the man that keeps him there, and what is the difference between the plan of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] and the plan now in vogue in the Departments?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended in order that he may be permitted to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Georgia may be extended in order that he may be permitted to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, perhaps the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] will appreciate and understand our effort more when I tell him that year after year, for six or eight years perhaps, we have put a clause in the legislative appropriation bill that no part of this appropriation shall be paid to a clerk or employee incapacitated otherwise than temporarily.

Mr. WATSON. We remember that.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Our purpose was to get rid of this very thing. That is up to us now. Our purpose was to have these heads of the Departments and the chiefs of bureaus sift out these men.

Mr. WATSON. But it did not work?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. They would not do it.

Mr. WATSON. That is the point.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And they came before us, as the gentleman will see in the hearings, and absolutely stated to us positively that they did not do it and they will not do it again.

Mr. WATSON. Wherein does the gentleman's plan differ from the plan now in vogue?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The gentleman from Indiana puts it as my plan. I put it on the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. WATSON. And the Civil Service Commission believes in retaining them as long as they live?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No; they believe in the reverse. That is the fear I have. They want to put in more. They have nothing to do there except to fill the places caused by resignations and deaths and things like that. The gentleman does not seem to understand that business.

Mr. WATSON. I think I understand the Civil Service Commission, and that is what I am complaining about.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I have no doubt about that.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. What reason was given by the Department for the failure to get rid of these people?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. They said it was inhumane. They did not have the heart to turn an old man or an old woman out.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Do they believe that we act without heart in this matter?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I refer the gentleman to the hearings.

I would not like to quote anyone without having the hearings before me.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I thought perhaps the gentleman remembered.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I do remember, but I would rather be exact about it. I would hate to say just what Secretary Root said and what the Secretary of War said. It is all there in the hearings. I think I can safely say this, however, and I hope to be corrected by the chairman of the committee if I am mistaken, that the great majority approve this proposition.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Then they assume that Members of Congress are heartless, I suppose?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I suppose they can charge us with being heartless, of course, and then they come here and say, "You heartless men in Washington, you get $5,000 insurance on your lives," and all that sort of stuff, and they ask us what we are talking about—what we mean. I do not know what they will do, but let us do right if the heavens fall. We will have it to do some day, but you and I are here now, unfortunately, perhaps.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. And for our constituency, too, perhaps.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. But we are here and we have to meet it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia what truth there is in the contention that, or what his observation is as to whether or not, a person, say, 75 years old, can add up these long columns of figures we see and use and do the tedious work that you know these expert calculators and clerks have to do? I rarely ever see them doing anything except writing a letter or adding up long columns of figures. Does the proof show that a man 75 years old can do that character of work day after day?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I refer you to the hearings. I will loan you a copy.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I asked the gentleman for his personal observation. If he will give me that I think I will be a wiser man. The gentleman from Georgia was comparing, I think, a few moments ago some Senator—I take it to be some United States Senator—who was possibly a very old man. Now, I dare say there is not a man 75 years old in this country who, day after day, could add up these long columns of figures without utterly withering and dying from such hard work. We certainly would not employ a man 75 years old to do that work daily.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I want to say this, that I think we gathered from the investigation this fact, that when men pass 70 years of age, and perhaps 65 years of age, as a rule they were not so competent, they were not so valuable to the Government, but there were some very remarkable exceptions and they were exceptions in places where you can not very well spare the men. And I will say the less the chief of the division knows and the less the head of the Department knows the more valuable that man is to that place, and it intensifies the reason why he ought to stay. Do you catch the idea? They trust to these men. The head of the Department trusts him, the chief trusts him, and when he is in a close place on a problem he sends for him. He has not got too old to do that kind of work, and there are some exceptions of that kind which came out in the hearings and my plan discriminates in their favor. The other makes a dead line they must walk up to when they reach that age.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is a very distressing condition to deal with, in my judgment. It is shocking to turn out these old people and yet it is detrimental to the service to retain them. Nobody wants to be harsh or hard on them, of course, yet we have to be cruel sometimes to be kind.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, there is another advantage in my plan. It takes away the responsibility of a Congressman when he comes to vote. His own constituent is involved. He may be as honest as honest can be and there is none of us who can not be influenced on the side of humanity sometimes. Whether you can get the Members of this House to stand up here and throw out of their minds and hearts all of the people that they are interested in and vote for that dead line proposed in the bill is one proposition, but when you see it can be done and the Government benefited as largely and securely by another plan, by putting that burden where I contend it ought to be placed—not on you and not on me, but on those people who put them in—and let them put them out.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman explained why the committee fixed on the year 1913 for the dead line?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. We would rather let you guess at that.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I can not guess at that.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt and answer the gentleman's question——

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I do not want to have a guess on this, because it affects the happiness of a great many people.

Mr. TAWNEY. This is not fixed on the basis of a guess at all, but the idea is this: Here are 586 people in the Departments who admit they are 70 years of age or over. How many there are who are more than 70, but who refuse to admit it, we do not know.

Now, those people have had no notice that action of this kind to separate them from the service would be taken, and we thought that by extending the time for their separation from the service—namely, seven years—would practically take care of those who are now in the service and have reached 70 years of age. So it removes the charge of inhumanity as to those who are now in the service and are 70 years of age or over by continuing them in the service for seven years from July 1, 1906.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. As I understand——

Mr. TAWNEY. A man 70 years of age to-day would be separated from the service in seven years.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. No one would have worked out the problem at the end of seven years.

Mr. TAWNEY. There are men in the service drawing $1,600 who are 85 years of age, who have been furloughed and have not done a stroke of work for several years.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. There are men, Mr. Chairman—and we might as well finish the sentence—who are lifted in their chair to their desk, when they go at all. Let me say to you——

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Lifted in their chairs?

Mr. TAWNEY. And hauled to the Department day after day in carriages.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, two years, ago, I think it was, your subcommittee on this bill had the Commissioner of Pensions before us—not the present Commissioner, but the preceding one—and we began to catechise him. He said very candidly, "I have a hundred people I do not need." "Well," we said, "as Representatives of the Government we can not, my dear man, appropriate money for those people when you do not need them." He said, "Cut them out." We asked him in what class they were, and he went through and picked out the classes and cut out a hundred clerks. We came back the next winter and found we had to appropriate for every single one of them; that not one of them had been cut out. Now, can you think it strange that your Committee on Appropriations, after trying these different plans all these years, would come up here with an arbitrary rule? Why, we asked him the question, "Why did you not do it?" He said there were two causes—one was humanity and the other was pressure. You put this in here now, strike out that clause from the bill, adopting no substitute or amendment, and go away from here, and we will have to appropriate in a deficiency act next fall for a lot of clerks that we have not appropriated for—three or four or five hundred thousand dollars which we will have to come back here next winter and take care of.

Now, do not charge us with extravagance after this investigation, at least, for I tell that, as a humble member of that committee, we have done our duty and it is up to you, and we are not sticklers for a particular plan. You can put up a better one if you have it, and we will gladly accept it.

I thank the House, Mr. Chairman. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4376. An act to quitclaim all the interest of the United States of America in and to a certain lot of land lying in the District of Columbia and State of Maryland to heirs of John C. Rives, deceased;

S. 4169. An act to authorize the sale of certain real estate in the District of Columbia belonging to the United States;

S. 4046. An act to incorporate the Edes Home;

S. 4015. An act to construct and place a new light-ship at the entrance to Buzzards Bay, Massachusetts, to replace the one now known as "the Hen and Chickens light-ship;"

S. 4014. An act to construct and place a light-ship near the eastern end of Hedge Fence Shoal at the entrance to Vineyard Sound, Massachusetts;

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, the question of the removal of the internal-revenue tax from alcohol rendered unfit for drink has within it such tremendous possibilities for the good of the whole people of the United States, and makes so directly for the welfare of all the people of my district—the State of North Dakota—that I would be derelict did I fail to voice my earnest desire to see this legislation perfected, and express as best I can my reasons for my faith.

I have introduced a bill (H. R. 12075) covering this subject. It is expected, however, that the Committee on Ways and Means will draft a committee bill, and I shall therefore not discuss the provisions of my bill.

In explanation, let me say there are two kinds of alcohol proper—

First. Ethyl or grain alcohol, made by a process of mashing and distillation of any grains, fruits, vegetables, plants, or substances containing a considerable percentage of starch, confined in this country chiefly to use in beverages and medicines, and subject to a revenue tax and tariff, as I shall explain later.

Second. Methyl or wood alcohol, made from wood, as a by-product of charcoal, by distilling and treating the fumes and smoke that would otherwise escape into the air. It is highly poisonous, has a bad odor, and is untaxed.

And here let me add that denaturized alcohol is made from grain alcohol by the admixture of a greater or less percentage of crude wood alcohol or of numerous other denaturizing agents, rendering it nauseating, distasteful, foul smelling, and in a degree poisonous, and therefore unfit to drink, or "nonpotable," as it is termed, but not injuring it in any degree for manufacturing purposes and for use for fuel, light, and power, for which latter uses it is colored violet in England and green in France.

EXISTING CONDITIONS.

Mr. Chairman, a full knowledge of existing conditions is naturally precedent to action looking to changes. Under the present law there is a tariff of $2.25 per proof gallon on grain alcohol, which there is no intention of disturbing, and there is an internal-revenue tax of $1.10 per proof gallon, and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such proof gallon.

Right here let me make clear what is meant by proof gallon, in order that no confusion may arise.

A proof gallon of distilled spirits is 50 parts of pure spirits and 50 parts water—in all 100 parts—which is used as a basis. Pure alcohol is known as "200 proof," and is subject to a tax double, or 200 per cent, that of a proof gallon—that is, $2.20.

The ordinary spirits of commerce, however, range around 190 proof, and bear a tax of 190 per cent of $1.10, equal to $2.09 per commercial or wine gallon.

In the same way, 188 proof spirits bear a proportionate tax, being $2.078 per commercial gallon.

There are also in our law minor provisions for the use of alcohol for scientific, educational, and experimental purposes free of tax, and also for its use by the War and Navy Departments and for the hospital service, and also not to exceed 25 per cent to be added to the sweet wines for their fortification, and its use in vinegar. But with these provisions we are not particularly concerned at this time.

There is no provision, however, in our law by which denaturized alcohol can be released from bond, tax free, for any purpose whatever.

OTHER COUNTRIES.

Mr. Chairman, let us contrast the condition in the United States with that of all the important commercial nations in the world. Great Britain, Germany, France, Switzerland, Holland, Belgium, Italy, Russia, Sweden, Norway, Australia, Hungary, Portugal, Cuba, Peru, Venezuela, Brazil, Argentine Republic, and Chile collect no revenue from denaturized alcohol used for industrial purposes.

We stand, therefore, as the one important nation which imposes a prohibitive tax on the manufacture and use of denaturized alcohol.

CHANGES PROPOSED.

The tax imposed on this useful material is from 1,200 to 2,000 per cent of its cost to manufacture, and therefore effectually prohibits its use in countless manufactures, and completely prevents its use for the purposes of light, power, and heat.

It is not a part of the plan to remove the tax from spirits used as a beverage, or in patent medicines, chemicals, etc. In fact, it is not proposed to remove the tax from ethyl or grain alcohol proper, except for its use by certain manufacturers strictly under bond.

The proposition is to permit the removal from bond, without tax, of denaturized alcohol.

By permitting the use of this tax-free alcohol we will put our manufacturers and consumers on an equal footing with those of other nations. Furthermore, the present law in effect not only prohibits the manufacture of grain alcohol for use in the arts and industries, but acts as a protection to the manufacturers of methyl or wood alcohol and the producers of liquid fuel, such as kerosene and gasoline and illuminating oils, which are all tax free.

Here, then, in brief, is the condition. A prohibitive tax against the foreign producers—an equally prohibitive tariff at home—which act as a protection for one industry against another, thereby subverting absolutely the principle of free trade between our home industries.

On this point I can not do better than quote the views of the late Senator Platt of Connecticut and the late Representative Russell, in the report from the joint select committee of Congress on the use of alcohol in the manufactures and arts, as follows:

> It has been an unquestioned principle of American taxation that internal revenue taxes should not be laid upon articles of domestic production necessarily used in the manufacture of other articles. To tax an article of our own growth or manufacture is to impose upon the consumer of other articles, in the production of which the taxed article must necessarily be employed, a burden to which he ought not to be subjected.
> It is not believed that anyone will seriously contend that upon principle an article of domestic production used for a lawful, beneficial, and necessary purpose should be liable to this species of taxation. On the other hand, we can not but think it will be admitted by all that such taxation in itself is contrary to public policy, injurious to our commercial and industrial development, and against the general welfare.

To my mind there is no politics in this proposition. Republicans and Democrats alike are free traders so far as their home markets are concerned. It is a deplorable condition, contrary to the spirit of our institutions, which permits our revenue laws to be used to protect one industry against another. The revenue laws are for the purpose of raising needed funds for the support of the Government, and their functions cease there.

Mr. Chairman, having touched somewhat lightly upon the conditions that point so urgently to the need of this legislation, let us turn to the possible objections that can be urged against it. They are four:

First. The possible loss of revenue by the displacement of tax-paid alcohol now used in the arts and manufactures.

Second. Expense of administration and supervision of under the new law.

Third. Danger of fraud against the revenue by the recovery of potable alcohol from denaturized alcohol, and evading the tax.

Fourth. Danger of injury to wood-alcohol industry.

I shall take these objections up in the order named and show that the loss of revenue resulting from the displacement of tax-paid alcohol will not be material; that the expense of administration will be nominal as compared with the benefits, and suggest a way to provide for it, if need be; that the incentive to frauds will be no greater than now, while the difficulties in the way of frauds will be greater; that the loss of revenue from all sources, taken together with the cost and difficulties of administration and supervision, will be a small factor against the tremendous possibilities wrapped up in this proposition, and, finally, that the wood-alcohol industries will not be seriously injured.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Dakota is making a very strong argument in favor of this bill, and what he says meets with my hearty concurrence. I am especially glad that he has alluded to the fact that the wood-alcohol industry will not be injuriously affected by the passage of this bill. I have quite a number of letters expressing fear that the passage of this bill would destroy a large part of the wood-alcohol industry. I am very glad to have the gentleman make the statement that he has, because I know he has studied the subject very carefully. You are quite firmly convinced of that fact, from your own investigation?

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, I am not only firmly convinced, but hope to be able as I go along to convince my friend as well as the other members of the committee; and I will reach that feature of the subject a little later, and will be glad to answer any and all questions at that time.

After having thus met the objections that have been raised, I shall develop the fact that denaturized alcohol can be made and sold at a price, if free from tax, that will bring it into direct competition with kerosene and gasoline throughout the larger section of this country; and having this fact established, I shall touch as fully as time will permit on the uses and benefits to the agricultural classes of this grand new industrial agent that is destined, in a degree, to revolutionize certain of our economical conditions.

I. LOSS OF REVENUE.

Beginning with the question of revenue: When the hearing opened it was uppermost in the minds of all interested that the revenue would be seriously affected by the withdrawal of denaturized alcohol without tax, based upon a supposition that it would displace in the manufactures a large amount of tax-paid alcohol. This theory has been somewhat supported by the report of the joint select committee, already referred to, appointed June 3, 1896, which concluded that there were about 9,000,000 gallons of grain tax-paid alcohol used in the arts and industries at that time, which paid revenue of between ten and eleven million dollars. However, as the hearings progressed, it is safe to say that practically all apprehension as to serious loss of revenue has been cleared away.

Unfortunately it is not susceptible of proof by statistics what the loss will be, if any.

In this connection I will quote Commissioner Yerkes before the Ways and Means Committee, page 8 of the first print of the hearings. Mr. Yerkes says:

I understand, and it is a matter of common rumor, that there is a wide difference of opinion to-day as to the quantity of tax-paid grain alcohol that is now being used in the arts and manufactures for pharmaceutical purposes, heating, lighting, and so forth, in this country. Some claim that the quantity used is exceedingly small and that therefore the loss of revenue would be very light should legislation of this type be enacted. I presume that is one of the questions the committee would like to be informed upon. On that question I can simply say that the authentic records and data of the Treasury Department in my bureau show absolutely nothing. We do not trace a gallon of tax-paid alcohol into the hands of the manufacturers. This tax is paid by the distiller, and then it passes out from under our control or observation, unless it comes back through rectifying or wholesale houses in some way.

So we are left largely to conjectures, or estimates, in determining in actual figures on the amount of tax-paid alcohol used in this country for these purposes.

The figures used by the select committee were taken from the census returns of 1891, including the alcohol used in chemicals and patent medicines, etc., which, I may add, was included within the scope of their investigations, and which accounted for a considerable quantity of tax-paid alcohol included in the census returns.

It will be understood that the legislation proposed does not permit the use of untaxed alcohol for any such purposes. As a matter of fact, denaturized alcohol would be totally unfit for use in chemicals, patent medicines, etc. It will therefore be seen clearly that no loss of revenue can come from that particular source.

The manufacturers of wood alcohol have made great progress since 1896 in rectifying and purifying their products, placing them on the market in direct competition with grain alcohol under various trade names, such as "Columbia Spirits," "Eagle Spirits," "Colonial Spirits," "Imperial Spirits," and so on.

Mr. Lummis, general manager of the Commonwealth Manufacturing Company, of Boston, says (p. 193 of the hearings):

Methyl wood alcohol has found its way, as I say, to all the highly manufactured products. I have here a list of 110 different industries in which our product [meaning highly refined methyl alcohol] is used.

Further on Mr. Lummis says:

There is no chemical industry even in Germany more scientifically developed than the distillation of wood products in this country.

He says the yearly output of this highly refined methyl spirits amounts to 900,000 gallons, of which his company makes about one-third, and which are consumed by 110 industries named by him, and doubtless by numerous others.

No one can question the fact that each gallon of this methyl alcohol has displaced a gallon of ethyl alcohol and to this extent has depleted the revenues.

In 1900 there was, according to the census reports, made in this country 4,000,000 gallons of wood alcohol. In 1904 this amount was increased to 12,000,000 gallons. And unquestionably to a very large degree this alcohol displaces grain alcohol.

It is plain to all that no factory will use grain alcohol at $2.30 to $2.50 per gallon when they can by any possible means use wood alcohol at from 70 cents to $1.50 per gallon.

Aside from the highly refined wood alcohol used, as I have explained, in high-class manufactures there are many millions of gallons used in other ways. For instance, Mr. Gray, a commission merchant and exporter of New York, tells us this (p. 267 of the hearings):

I imagine that we use in the United States 8,000,000 gallons of wood alcohol as a solvent. Formerly grain alcohol was used, and all admit that it is better.

So can anyone doubt that this particular 8,000,000 gallons of wood alcohol displace an equal amount of taxed grain alcohol?

In the face of these facts it would seem that the claim that the revenue will be depleted by this legislation has not a leg to stand on. The conditions point plainly to the fact that wood alcohol has already displaced the tax-paid alcohol and that no depletion of the revenue worth considering can possibly be the result from the proposed legislation. But we will go into this important feature of the legislation a little further.

The only estimate, and a seemingly very conservative one, is made by Mr. Klein, of the Philadelphia Trades League, and was obtained by going over the trades one by one and estimating liberally the amount of grain alcohol used by each, the total being some 5,200 barrels, equal to about 440,000 gallons, the tax on which would be less than $500,000.

Following this, Mr. Klein says (p. 51 of the hearings):

If this estimate is disputed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue I would suggest that he be asked to specify in detail the quantities of taxed grain alcohol used in the various industries for which untaxed denatured grain alcohol would be substituted.

When this subject was being investigated in 1897 by the joint select committee appointed by Congress, the Acting Commissioner of Internal Revenue at that time, Mr. G. W. Wilson, appeared before that committee and submitted facts and figures to prove that refined wood alcohol would in a few years entirely supersede the use of grain alcohol for industrial processes.

In order to avoid the loss in revenue which this substitution would entail, he recommended a tax of 55 cents per proof gallon on refined wood alcohol.

Unquestionably the prophecy of Mr. Wilson has come true.

Secretary Shaw, in connection with another hearing before the Ways and Means Committee, recently made the statement, I am advised, that he did not think the revenues would be seriously affected by this legislation; and on page 291 of the hearings Secretary Shaw testifies:

While I hesitated last year to put a recommendation for this legislation into my report because of the condition of the Treasury, the condition of the Treasury has now very greatly improved—beyond anyone's anticipation. We are now running on a surplus. Of course it is not large yet; but a year ago we had a deficit of $25,000,000 for the current fiscal year, and now we have a surplus of a little over a million, so that we can stand a little loss in revenues for so great an enterprise.

Further on Secretary Shaw remarks:

If you think you can get it through—without any tax at all, I do not want to stand here and oppose it, and even if it should cut down the revenue somewhat I am disposed to think we can stand the cut.

Meaning the legislation—

The wood-alcohol people argued forcibly and eloquently for their interests, feeling, as they do—I think, however, wrongly—that their life is endangered; but they are "hoist by their own petard." When they prove so conclusively that their products have displaced grain alcohol they are witnesses against their statement that the revenues would be seriously affected; and when they point proudly to the enormous increase of 200 per cent of their business from 1900 to 1904 they simply clinch the fact that their product has practically displaced grain alcohol in the industries.

Unquestionably they, who have by forcing the cheap and inferior tax-free product into the highways and byways of trade, into high-class and low-class manufactures, and, I might add, into legitimate and illegitimate channels of trade, are responsible for a tremendous decrease in our revenue.

They who have done so much to decrease our revenue for years back are the last who should come to the Congress and express deep concern for the loss of revenue by reason of permitting the manufacture of denaturized alcohol tax free. Their arguments savor too strongly of selfish interests, and their eloquence can but argue them out of court.

II. EXPENSE OF ADMINISTRATION.

There is no data to be had bearing on this feature of the question and no precedents to be cited, the proposition being one new in this country, and conditions in foreign countries where denaturized alcohol is sold tax free are so radically different that comparisons are of but little value.

On page 292 of the hearings I find this:

The CHAIRMAN. Will you give us an estimate of what it will cost to take care of this denatured alcohol—the cost to the Government?

Secretary SHAW. Commissioner Yerkes and I made our guesses separately [laughter], and we came within $50,000 of each other—that is to say, I guessed $200,000, and he guessed $250,000.

Department officials are, we all know, experts on estimates and not prone to make them too low, so it is fairly safe to assume that this is a liberal allowance; but even if it were doubled it would not be an item that would be worth considering as against the tremendous benefits that will accrue to all our people growing out of the proposed legislation. Furthermore, the manufacturers have expressed an entire willingness to have a tax left on denaturized alcohol intended for their use sufficient to cover the entire cost of administration of not only alcohol used by them, but that intended to be used for heat, light, and power as well, provided it is deemed necessary and wise to impose such a tax rather than allow the Government to pay it.

FRAUD.

We now come to the question of danger of fraud and the increased use of alcohol as a beverage, growing out of the recovery of grain alcohol from denaturized alcohol.

Bearing on this question of fraud, Professor Wiley, Chief Chemist of the Agricultural Department, had the following to say during the recent hearings:

I wish, however, to say right here that I do not believe there is any method now known, or any that is likely to be proposed, for denaturing alcohol which is of such a character that a skilled chemist may not obtain more or less of that alcohol in a potable form from the mixture. I want to say this, because that is one of the objections which has been urged against this legislation, and is one which I think is wholly untenable.

It is not a question whether a chemist, working for days and sometimes for weeks, may be able to separate the pure product from the mixture, because that is the function of the chemist. The question, it seems to me, is whether such a separation could be made in such a way as to make it a commercial success in the face of the penitentiary, which would confront the effort on all occasions.

In the first place, Mr. Chairman, no reputable chemist would undertake such a task, and certainly no member of the American Chemical Society would do so, because he would understand fully that such an effort would merit and perhaps receive the condemnation of the society and of the court, with appropriate punishment.

Another thing which I think your committee should remember is this, that an immense majority of the manufacturing men of this country are thoroughly honest men and obedient to the law. Not one in a hundred of them would ever make any attempt to avoid a law of this kind. So that you may say 99 per cent of your revenues are assured and protected without any punishment at all, by the reason of the natural honesty of mankind.

Continuing, he says:

I think it would cost a good deal more. I think the cost of restoring denatured alcohol to pure alcohol would be greater than to manufacture and pay the tax on a fresh portion of properly made alcohol.

On page 53 of the hearings I found the following by Mr. Klein:

I am informed that it is susceptible of practical demonstration that the illicit recovery of alcohol from untaxed denatured alcohol would cost as much as the illicit distillation of a like quantity of alcohol from corn, potatoes, sugar, or molasses. If this is conceded, it is quite important to note that the materials from which whisky may be illicitly distilled are always at hand in every household in the country, while denatured alcohol would have to be purchased in considerable quantities and removed to the place where the illicit recovery of the alcohol is intended to be carried on, and might easily lead to detection.

On page 17 of the hearings Mr. Yerkes gave the following testimony:

I do not think there would be any more danger of fraud than we have now by reason of illicit practices in distilled spirits. I suppose the purifying of this denatured alcohol would require the very finest type of still, and everything of that kind. It would be difficult to find a place where they could operate it. They could not operate it in the mountains. They would have to go up into the tenth story of some of these buildings, where they could have a modern equipment.

The whole gist of the question of fraud lies in the fact that it will cost more, probably many times more, to recover potable alcohol from denaturized alcohol than to distill it from the raw material.

There is no reason to think that temptation to fraud will, under the new condition of things, be any greater than it is now.

With this statement of the case we may dismiss this feature of the question without further apprehension.

INJURY TO THE WOOD-ALCOHOL INDUSTRIES.

Mr. Chairman, there is probably in the history of legislation in this country, illogical and erratic as it often has been, no precedent that will quite parallel the existing revenue laws which so completely work to the prosperity of the wood-alcohol producers and the producers of illuminating and fuel oils.

As I said before the committee, "they have been the fortunate beneficiaries of a most peculiar condition, the like of which has never been known before, ought not to exist now, and should never be known again."

Tax free themselves and protected from foreign competition by a high tariff wall and from home competition by the revenue tax of from 1,200 to 2,000 per cent of the first cost of grain alcohol, they have been able to force through the various channels of trade on an unwilling public a substance inferior in quality for most uses to which grain alcohol can be put, and practically displaced that product from every use (save that of beverages, medicines, and it is generally believed that they are even encroaching on that use), thereby not only depriving the Government of much revenue, but restricting the farmer's market for raw material to a large degree.

In justice to them it can be said, on the other hand, that, to equalize the equation somewhat, they have saved the manufacturer considerable sums by supplying him with a cheaper article. But even granting this, the manufacturers have been sufferers to the extent of many millions, because our laws have denied them the use of tax-free denaturized alcohol.

Wood alcohol, as its name implies, is distilled from wood, and is made as a by-product in the process of burning charcoal.

Formerly charcoal was the only product of the wasteful process. Now, however, the fumes and smoke are saved, distilled, and treated, the principal products being crude wood alcohol and acetate of lime. And it is interesting to note that the by-products of the process of manufacturing charcoal have grown to be the equivalent of nearly four times the value of the original product.

To illustrate, I quote from the report of Professor Monroe, of the Census Bureau, who makes the statement that as the result of the burning and distillation of wood the value of the charcoal is only 21 per cent, while the acetate of lime is 27 per cent and the wood alcohol is 52 per cent, or more than twice that of the entire value of the other products.

There is no better illustration of our scientific and commercial development than is found in the progress and growth of the business of the wood-products people. We can not but admire the energy, ingenuity, and intelligence that mark their history. The cooperation of labor, brains, and capital has wrought wonders.

The figures of the census of 1904, as given by Professor Monroe, show that the total value of the wood alcohol, acetate of lime, and charcoal, which were made in conjunction, was $8,601,000. And this is probably a fairly correct measure of the size of the industry in the United States at that time, it having more than doubled in the four years from 1900 to 1904.

The claim is set up by the wood-alcohol people that tax-free denaturized alcohol will drive their product from the market, because it can be sold cheaper and is generally admitted as superior for most uses. Doubtless they will suffer to a degree, but that they will be seriously injured or driven out of business I can not believe.

They will always have an export market for their product, which is a growing and undoubtedly profitable one, and there are numerous uses for wood alcohol where denaturized alcohol will not answer, and new uses are being and will doubtless be discovered.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I notice that the gentleman from North Dakota has given this subject a great deal of very careful study. I would like to ask him now if he has made any investigation into the fact as to whether or not the necessary use of more or less wood alcohol in the denatured alcohol will or will not decrease the use of wood alcohol?

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, I will reach that in a very short time, and will show that wood alcohol will be used very largely as a denaturant, and will in time increase its use beyond its present production.

Refined wood alcohol has displaced for many years taxed grain alcohol, and there can be no question but that it will be afforded an ample market. But the greatest use of crude wood alcohol will be for denaturizing purposes.

Manufacturers can well afford to use denaturized alcohol containing a large percentage of wood alcohol. The use of denaturized alcohol for light, power, and heat—although the percentage of wood alcohol used must be very low in order to keep the cost down to the minimum—will doubtless grow far beyond the anticipations of all, and will, in a great measure, absorb the remainder of the wood alcohol in this country.

The proposed legislation, of course, removes the protection at home that wood alcohol has so long enjoyed, and their industry will be put where it belongs—on an exact equality with other industries.

The meat of their whole argument lies in the statement that their industries have been built up under existing revenue laws. In other words, having been permitted to build up a big industry as the outgrowth of legislation, based upon false economics, and benefited by these conditions for the last forty years, they feel that they would be outraged by a readjustment of conditions. Again, having enjoyed what they were not entitled to for the last forty years, they should have it for all time to come.

I note that the complaint is voiced largely by the refiners of wood alcohol, who have formed themselves into a trust, admitting that they sell their products cheaper in foreign countries than at home, and undoubtedly holding the actual producers of raw wood alcohol at their mercy, as they can buy the crude product at their own price. They admit freely that they regulate the price of the finished product—i. e., refined methyl alcohol.

Under these conditions it is possible that some of the producers of wood alcohol may be relieved by the proposed legislation rather than injured, as the crude and not the refined article will be used as the denaturizing agent and the producers of the crude material would doubtless be afforded a new market, and to that extent those outside of the wood-alcohol trust would be relieved from its oppression and benefited.

In a general way it is fairly safe to conclude that this lusty infant will survive under the new conditions. The same forces—that is, brains, energy, and capital—that found the way to obtain from the by-products of the manufacture of charcoal value nearly four times the original product; that enables them to extort enormous profits by regulating the price at home and abroad; that puts them on such confidential relations with the Standard Oil Company that it is believed that they come here as one interest clamoring for a continuance of illegitimate conditions that have completely driven a kindred industry from the market; I say, that the same forces and agencies that have enabled them to do these and other things will serve them equally well to combat the new order of things, and while they doubtless will pay less dividends they unquestionably will, I believe and hope, be able to survive and render an adequate return for legitimate investment.

But in the event more or less injury falls to their lot, growing out of the legislation contemplated, the fact that they have grown up under conditions very unwise, from an economic standpoint, is not an argument why such conditions should be longer continued.

The proposition to foster one home industry to the destruction of another by means of our present revenue laws is absolutely indefensible, even from the standpoint of selfishness.

The Congress would certainly never sanction such a ruinous economic policy as a new proposition, and the fact that an industry has grown up under such false conditions does not materially alter the case.

To summarize: I have deliberately avoided going into statistics and technicalities, partly for want of time, but largely because the field will doubtless be better covered by others. However, I have endeavored to keep well within the realm of the facts, and have been inspired by a spirit of conservatism.

I have necessarily touched lightly the subject covered, leaving much to be filled in by those who may follow. But I feel that enough has been said to warrant the following conclusions as regards the objections raised to the legislation:

First. That the revenues will not be impaired to an extent in any degree commensurate with the benefits.

Second. That the cost of administration and supervision is in no degree prohibitive and is a secondary consideration, and I have suggested a means to meet it.

Third. That there doubtless will be some frauds committed, but the conditions under which they will occur will be less favorable than exist at the present time and the incentive to fraud no greater, and that there is nothing impracticable or impossible in the execution of the proposed new law.

Fourth. That the wood-alcohol industry may be affected to a certain degree, but not seriously; but even should it be, it is not a legitimate argument against the proposed changes.

If the Government will suffer no considerable decrease of revenue by loss of tax, either legitimate or through fraud, and will not be put to a prohibitive expense of administration and supervision; and with the illegitimate child of the false economic conditions—the Wood Products Company and its allied interests—safely under the motherly wing of the Standard Oil Company, it would seem that the decks are fairly clear and the time for action had come.

Mr. CAPRON. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman permit me to interrupt him there? I would like to ask the gentleman if, from the careful study he has given the subject, whether or not he does not believe that the enactment of this legislation would result in a considerable diminution of the revenues of the Government?

Mr. MARSHALL. Before the gentleman came in I covered that subject quite fully, but I will state briefly this: That I think I make no mistake when I say that in the minds of those who attended the hearings, and, I believe, in the minds of the Ways and Means Committee as well, that feature of the question has faded away, and it has been fairly demonstrated and admitted by most people, and the wood-alcohol people themselves that refined wood alcohol has forced its way into the channels of trade which were formerly occupied by taxed alcohol, and has almost, if not wholly, displaced it.

BENEFITS FROM THE NEW ORDER OF THINGS.

Aside from the general good that will come to all our people in a comprehensive way, there are two interests that will be directly and materially benefited.

First. The numerous manufacturing industries and those dependent and identified with them.

Second. The agricultural classes and those closely allied with them, and particularly the residents of the small towns and cities in the agricultural States.

It has been no part of my plan to attempt to cover this whole subject, and I will purposely not touch upon the manufacturing industries affected by the introduction of tax-free alcohol as an industrial agent.

This is a subject broad enough alone to fill the time allotted to me, but there are doubtless others who will do it full justice. As an index, however, I will submit the following list of industries in the United States now using wood alcohol as a solvent which would use untaxed denatured alcohol in the event of such legislation by Congress: Aniline colors and dyes, hats (stiff, silk, and straw), electrical apparatus, transparent soap, furniture, picture moldings, burial caskets, cabinetwork, passenger cars, pianos, organs, whips, toys, rattan goods, lead pencils, brushes, wagons, boots and shoes, smokeless powder, fulminate of mercury, brass beds, gas and electric-light fixtures, various kinds of metal hardware, incandescent mantles, photographic materials, celluloid and other like compounds, sulphuric ether, and organic chemicals.

The so-called question of tax-free alcohol has been agitated mostly by organized manufacturers for many years, and growing out of this is a feeling abroad that their interests are by far the largest. A thoughtful consideration of the subject, Mr. Chairman, however, can but reveal the error of this view of the case and lead to the unquestionable conclusion that the farming classes will be by far the largest beneficiaries of this wise economic policy, should it be adopted.

The good that will accrue to them may be classed under three heads, which I will name in inverse order of their importance:

First. The benefit that will come to them as their share in the general prosperity growing out of the renewed impetus given to our manufacturing business.

Second. The benefit of a greatly increased market for raw material from which alcohol is made, of which they will be the producers.

Third. The chief benefit, however, will come to them as the consumers of alcohol—a clean, safe, agreeable, and cheap substitute for kerosene and gasoline.

That the benefits named under the first two headings to the agricultural classes will accrue to a great extent is self-evident and needs no elucidation from me.

COST OF DENATURIZED ALCOHOL.

All will agree that the greatest good will, under proper conditions, come to our farmers and the citizens of the small towns and cities as consumers of denaturized alcohol, and the modicum of this good will be measured by the price to the consumers.

Briefly stated, it must come in direct competition with kerosene and gasoline, gallon for gallon, but it should be said that for the purposes of light and heat it is doubtless superior to either, in that it is infinitely cleaner, safer, and pleasanter, and gives better results.

Much has been said during the hearing regarding the price at which denaturized alcohol can be made and sold; the wood-alcohol people having ingenuously and purposely thrown a shroud of mystery and a haze of doubt around the subject, stoutly contending that denaturized alcohol can not be made at a price to compete with kerosene and gasoline, in the hope of weakening the ardor of the agricultural interests that are behind this great movement.

The estimates of the wood-alcohol people are very unfair, wherein they undertake to prove that tax-free alcohol can not be placed on the market for less than 35 or 40 cents per gallon—some even claiming it would be as high as 50 cents.

To begin with, they take the cost of grain alcohol in this country now as 30 cents per gallon, which is much too high, as I shall show later.

In a general way they base their figures on sound merchantable corn in the great market centers, adding to this excessive expenses of denaturizing, for cost of packages, etc., and compare this inflated price of alcohol with the price of gasoline and kerosene in the large cities, where it is always naturally cheap.

In the western portions of the United States the price of gasoline and kerosene ranges from 50 to 200 per cent higher than in the cities.

Alcohol can be made in the primary markets where the raw material is produced and where it will be free from transportation charges. Merchantable corn, for example, worth 40 cents in Chicago, would be worth hardly 30 cents in the primary markets of Iowa or Minnesota.

It should be remembered always that alcohol for any other than drinking purposes can be made from grain or other raw material of inferior quality.

It is a well-established fact that 2½ gallons of alcohol can be made from a bushel of corn, which, at 30 cents—a fair price in the home market—means 12-cent alcohol, as the by-products of the distillery are worth fully enough for hog and cattle feed to pay the expense of distillation. In this lies another reason why distilleries should be in the country, where not only the stock, hogs, and cattle are at hand, but additional feed and roughage to make up a properly balanced ration with the waste from the distilleries.

Mr. Chairman, let me read a letter addressed to Commissioner Yerkes. I will not give the name of the writer, as I am doubtful of my authority to do so, but I am advised that all the facts will appear in the final print of the hearings:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 26, 1906.

Hon. JOHN W. YERKES,
Internal Revenue Department,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. YERKES: At the hearing before the Committee on Ways and Means last week the wood alcohol people represented that the use of denatured alcohol for heating, lighting, and power was not possible owing to the great cost of alcohol, and suggested that we had misrepresented that cost. Figures were produced which tended to show that alcohol would cost about 50 cents per wine gallon. The witnesses for the denatured-alcohol law based all of their statements upon a cost of 30 cents, which I gave them as a very conservative figure.

In order to accurately determine this question, however, I have had the figures taken from an alcohol distillery at Peoria, Ill., which has operated almost continuously from January, 1896, to December, 1905. During this entire time the distillery has only been idle thirteen months, and for short periods in each year, so that the operations cover substantially all the varying market prices of corn and other expenses. The cost during this period has been as low as 5.20 cents per proof gallon, which at 190 proof would be 9.88 cents per wine gallon of alcohol, and the highest point reached during all these years was 18.09 cents per gallon, which at 190 per cent would equal 34.37 cents for a wine gallon of alcohol. This highest cost, however, occurred only in one month, July, 1902, when the average cost of the corn used was 66.56 cents per bushel, which, of course, was abnormal. In fact, from December, 1901, to October, 1902, corn cost above 60 cents a bushel, but in spite of this fact the cost per wine gallon of alcohol at 190 proof never exceeded 30 cents, except in the months of June, July, and August of 1902; the highest point being in July, 1902, as above stated. In all of the ten years there was no other period when the cost of production was not under 30 cents per wine gallon for alcohol at 190 proof, and the average for the ten years was 10.78 cents per gallon, equal to 20.48 cents for a wine gallon of alcohol.

For the ten years the average price of corn was 42.36 cents, which is just about the price at which corn is selling to-day, so that it is fair to assume that about 20 cents would be the average price for which alcohol could be produced from sound corn. As the profit on this article is usually only a fraction of a cent, even under existing conditions, it is evident that there has been no misrepresentations as to the availability of this article for all purposes to which gasoline and petroleum are now put, as well as for many other uses.

It must be borne in mind that the alcohol of to-day is made solely for beverage purposes, and must be produced from merchantable grain, no matter what the price of cereals may be.

Denatured alcohol, however, could be produced from any substance yielding starch or sugar in sufficient degree to make its use profitable, and unquestionably many cheaper substances would be employed so that denatured alcohol would certainly sell very much below the figures I have given.

All of these figures will be presented to the Committee on Ways and Means in due time, but I thought they might interest you, so take the liberty of submitting them herewith. If you would like to have the detailed figures of the distillery's operations, I shall be happy to furnish them to you.

It will be noted that at the average price of corn at 42.36 cents per bushel, the cost of alcohol at 190 proof was 20.48 cents per wine gallon, which means that the price of alcohol would be 14.15 cents per gallon with 30-cent corn.

On page 73 of the hearings the following reference is made to the subject by Mr. Charles H. Merritt:

Concerning the estimated cost of denatured spirit, we submit the following and refer to the report of the Commisioner of Internal Revenue for last fiscal year as to the yield per bushel of corn from large distilleries:

"Distillers concede that the average annual yield from a bushel of corn in the large distilleries is 5 proof gallons, which is equal to 2½ gallons of absolute alcohol, or 2.66 gallons testing 94 per cent. It is also conceded by the large distillers that the by-products used for feeding cattle pay the cost of distillation. Therefore the cost of producing grain alcohol can be exactly determined by the price paid for corn.

"Corn at 30 cents per bushel would produce 94 per cent alcohol at 11 cents.

"Corn at 35 cents per bushel would produce 94 per cent alcohol at 13 cents.

"Corn at 40 cents per bushel would produce 94 per cent alcohol at 15 cents."

These prices refer to 94 per cent, or 188 proof alcohol, which is about the grade best adapted for the purposes of fuel, light, and power; and the fact, strange as it may seem, is that a percentage of water, even as high as 10, actually improves the alcohol for those uses.

Mr. GRONNA. I would ask the gentleman, is it not a fact that the expert chemist before the Committee on Ways and Means testified that this alcohol can be made from sugar beets and cornstalks, grain, etc.?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Dakota may have sufficient time to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MARSHALL. I thank the gentleman from Minnesota, and answering the inquiry of my colleague I will say he is entirely right. Such testimony was given, and I shall enlarge on that feature of the question later.

Bearing on the question of price, Mr. Kline made the following statement:

But when you speak about denatured alcohol, which would probably be produced on a large scale in this country immediately, you must remember that the cost would be only 15 cents to 18 cents a gallon, and the temptation would be very small.

The CHAIRMAN. What is alcohol sold for by the gallon?

Mr. KLINE. The wholesale price of grain alcohol, as we sell it in the wholesale drug trade to-day, is, I think, about $2.30 a gallon. I, unfortunately, do not now do any buying; but that is about the price.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the tax on it?

Mr. KLINE. The tax is between $2.07 and $2.08 a gallon. In other words, the net price of alcohol without the tax is in the neighborhood of 22 or 23 cents a gallon.

This is for pure, highly refined alcohol made from a high grade of corn for beverage purposes, under existing conditions and with the distiller's and wholesale profit included.

The prices quoted are for alcohol made from corn, which is doubtless the best raw material; but it must be remembered that the range of raw material from which alcohol can be made is very wide, covering every substance—grain, fruit, or vegetable—containing starch or sugar in considerable quantity, including corn, cornstalks, Irish potatoes, sweet potatoes, sugar beets, yams, cassava plants, waste molasses, or sugar cane, and waste molasses from beet-sugar factories, the production of which is widely distributed throughout our country.

In my statement before the committee I used the following language:

The success of the wood-alcohol industry may be safely used to illustrate the possibilities of the manufacture and use of denaturized ethyl alcohol.

We have every right to expect that this same combination of brains and capital will so cheapen the production of alcohol as to make it available for every possible use. With the almost endless amount of raw material at hand, part of which at least can be produced in practically every county in the United States, it is discounting the intelligence and progressiveness of our people to say that we can not produce ethyl alcohol as cheaply as any other country. New processes will be discovered by which the cost will be cheapened, and new raw materials will be found.

Our manufacturers in every line of business are doing wonders to cheapen our products, and we daily purchase articles for our consumption and use and marvel at their cheapness; and there is no reason to suppose that ethyl alcohol will be an exception to the rule. It therefore seems that all fears that the cost of manufacturing alcohol will be prohibitive are groundless.

Next to the cost of manufacture comes the question of the cost of denaturizing for use for light, fuel, and power. For these purposes what is known as completely denaturized, or mineralized denatured, alcohol is almost wholly used in foreign countries.

This is made by adding to grain alcohol 2½ per cent of a substance composed of four parts wood alcohol and one part pyridine—a mineral by-product of coal tar.

Regarding the safety of this class of denaturized alcohol, on page 31 of the hearings I find the following conversation:

Mr. ROBERTSON. What is the percentage of denaturing material in that alcohol?

Mr. HERRICK. Two and one-half parts to 100 parts.

Mr. SMITH. It is four parts of crude wood alcohol and one part of pyridine.

Mr. HERRICK. Yes; this is made up on the formula I have read, and is recommended by the British Parliament. You will see, gentlemen, that there is no separation here. I would like to have the committee inspect that carefully and smell of it slightly to determine whether it is really palatable or not. I make the statement that no ordinary human stomach, except some degenerate or person of that character, could consume that as a beverage.

Mr. SMITH. Is it poisonous?

Mr. HERRICK. It is poisonous to some extent.

I want to call the attention of the committee carefully to the fact that this denatured alcohol can be colored. Violet is the color which the parliamentary commission recommended as one kind of complete denaturation, so that even if one did not smell the alcohol before drinking it, they would know it by its violet tint. If this Government chose to make it a pale green color, they could not help seeing that it was colored, and that would act as a security against poisoning persons drinking it by mistake. You see there are a great many safeguards that have been thrown about this matter.

Unfortunately I have no data at my command which gives the exact cost of this denaturant per gallon, but as four-fifths of it would be crude methyl alcohol, which, at 70 cents per gallon, would add about 1 cent to the cost, it would seem another cent would cover the remainder of the denaturant and the coloring matter; but this is a mere guess on my part.

Allowing 3 cents per gallon to cover the distiller's profit and the cost of the denaturant, we are assured of an abundant supply of denaturized alcohol for the purposes named at from 15 to 20 cents per commercial gallon, which is practically the average price at which kerosene and gasoline are sold all over that section of the country lying west of the Mississippi River, while in many places the price ranges from 20 to 30 cents per gallon.

Regulations that will permit the manufacture of alcohol in distilleries of as small capacity as is compatible with economical administration (and in this connection I will add that there are, according to the last report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, over 500 licensed distilleries in operation in this country, with a capacity of from 5 to 50 bushels of grain per day), and with an inexhaustible and varied supply of raw material growing on every farm, there can be no possibility of the manufacturers of denaturized alcohol forming a trust to control the price.

Doubtless much will be made by the farmers in cooperative distilleries.

I would gladly enlarge upon the possibilities of this industry, but time will not permit.

Mr. Chairman, believing that every fair-minded, thoughtful man will agree that the manufacture and sale of denaturized alcohol in direct competition with kerosene and gasoline is entirely practicable provided it is wholly freed from tax, I will leave that feature of the question and touch upon the question of the purposes to which this useful material can be placed from the standpoint of the farmer.

Undoubtedly great relief, comfort, and economy will grow out of the use of alcohol for lighting purposes. This subject was well exemplified by Prof. Rufus S. Herrick, representing the American Chemical Society, before the committee, beginning on page 27.

Professor Herrick exhibited an alcohol lamp, which would cost about $2, the burner of which is interchangeable with the ordinary kerosene burner. The lamp does not use a wick and is under such absolute control that it can be reduced in brilliancy so that it can be used in the sick room.

I will avoid technicalities, data, and figures and confine myself to such conservative generalities as are fully justified by the facts. Mr. Herrick refers to a report from the electrical testing laboratories of Preston D. Miller, of New York, on that subject. Quoting from the report, Mr. Herrick says:

I submit that this report shows that if we had two lamps of equal capacity, one burning alcohol and the other kerosene, the alcohol lamp would burn nearly twice as long as the kerosene lamp.

I have read a report of experiments conducted for an extended period by Professor Rosseau, of the University of Brussels, Belgium, in which careful photometric tests were made of both alcohol and kerosene burning lights. This report showed that for lighting purposes alcohol costing 31 cents per gallon is slightly cheaper than kerosene costing 15 cents per gallon.

And I may add that the alcohol lamp so far exceeds in excellence and comfort the foul smelling, dangerous, unclean kerosene and gasoline lamps, as they in turn surpass the tallow dip of our grandfathers.

And even though the conditions were reversed and alcohol cost twice as much, owing to its cleanliness and general efficiency, does anyone doubt that it would come into general use and displace kerosene and gasoline for lighting purposes?

Thousands of people use electricity, not because it is cheap, but because it is good—and so it will be with alcohol.

HEATING.

Gasoline is largely used for cooking in the West, although it is dangerous and much property and many lives are lost through explosions of gasoline stoves, and though the odor from them is disagreeable and more or less injurious to health.

The chief danger of gasoline lies in the fact that it volatilizes easily, making a very explosive gas, and from the further fact that gasoline will not mix with water. Burning gasoline will float on water and spread the fire, whereas water mixes at once with alcohol and extinguishes the fire.

Beyond all question alcohol will supersede gasoline and kerosene for cooking, owing to its efficiency, cleanliness, and safety to life and property.

USE IN ENGINES.

This brings us now to the internal-combustion engine. Few realize the size of the gasoline or internal-combustion engine industry. Mr. Capon, representing the Detroit Board of Commerce, made the following remarkable statement during the hearings:

Detroit alone will produce in 1906 enough gas engines for automobile, marine, pumping, and other uses to consume 200,000 gallons of fuel a day.

Is it any wonder that gasoline has practically doubled in price in a few years? And in view of the fact that only 2 per cent of gasoline can be made from petroleum, we are soon to face a famine in fuel for such engines unless relief is afforded.

It is well known that the largest percentage of automobiles are driven by gas engines. And agricultural implement manufacturers are preparing to turn these engines out by the thousands adapted for farmers' use.

The time is near at hand when every farmer will have one to pump water, haul his feed, run his cream separator, hoist his grain, unload his hay, and, ultimately, to do much of the trucking and drudgery of the farm and transport himself and family.

Practically all the elevators of the western half of the United States are operated by gas engines, and printing offices, machine shops, blacksmith shops, butcher shops, and countless small factories are equipped with these engines; and the generation of electricity is quite general by gas engines. And, as I speak, a new type of car is moving across this continent driven by electricity, generated as it travels by gasoline engines, or, at times, by both the surplus electricity from a storage battery (charged by the engines under way) and by the engines. Great things are expected from the experiment. And it is entirely within the possibilities that there will be opened up a hitherto unthought-of field for the use of fuel alcohol.

In a general way it is conceded that alcohol will displace the use of gasoline in internal-combustion engines. Some difficulties there are which will have to be overcome, one of which is the fact that alcohol volatilizes more slowly than gasoline, thereby making the engine harder to start. This is met by adding a percentage of gasoline to the alcohol or by starting the engine with gasoline. The combination of alcohol and gasoline makes a perfect fuel for engines.

Possibly other difficulties will have to be overcome, but overcome they will be as soon as the material is at hand.

Right here let Minister Squiers, of Habana, Cuba, speak for me and close this subject:

ALCOHOL MOTORS AND PUMPS IN CUBA.

[From United States Minister Squiers, Habana, Cuba.]

Matanzas, a city of about 40,000 inhabitants, has water connection in 1,700 out of 4,000 houses, which use about 100,000 gallons a day. The waterworks, operated by an American company incorporated in the State of Delaware, are located a few miles distant from the city, where there are springs giving excellent water in sufficient quantity to supply a city of 100,000 people.

The alcohol motor pump, used on Sunday last for the first time, is of German manufacture, and cost, complete with installation, $6,000. This motor pump is a 45-horsepower machine and is operated at a fuel cost of about 40 cents an hour, or $4 a day of ten hours, pumping 1,000,000 gallons of water.

As alcohol here is very cheap (10 cents a gallon) the running expenses of these motors are at the minimum. The Germans are selling in Cuba many such motors for electric-lighting and water plants at very low prices. One firm has a contract to put in an alcohol motor pump at Vento, for use in connection with the Habana water supply, which is expected to develop 180 horsepower, to cost, with installation, about $25,000, and to pump 1,000,000 gallons an hour at a fuel cost of $1.60. The same firm has installed an electric-plant alcohol motor of 45 horsepower, which supplies 138 lights (Hersh lamps) at a fuel cost of 5 cents an hour.

I call the attention of those who are interested in our Cuban trade to the fact that at the breakfast which followed the installation there was not one article on the table of American origin except the flour in the bread.

H. G. SQUIERS, Minister.

HABANA, CUBA, August 20, 1904.

Indicative of the vast quantities of kerosene and gasoline used in the West, I will say that I am advised by the State oil inspector of North Dakota that 2,216,650 gallons of gasoline and kerosene were shipped into that State for the calendar year 1904. And with a population of less than 400,000 at that time this is an average of over 5 gallons for every man, woman, and child in that State. And with the foul-smelling, unclean, dangerous, unsatisfactory gasoline and kerosene displaced by alcohol, and the enormous natural increase of the use of engines, it is easy to see that these figures will shortly be doubled.

Having said this much on the subject, let us turn for a moment to the relief.

Serious consideration leads me to believe that provision should be made:

First. For the use of pure alcohol in manufactures strictly under bond;

Second. For denatured alcohol containing from 5 to 10 per cent of methyl alcohol, for the use of manufacturers, under necessary rules of regulation, and if need be, subject to a tax of 5 cents or such other sum as is deemed necessary to pay the whole expense of administration and supervision of the law:

Third. For a mineralized denatured alcohol, containing 2½ per cent of a preparation made of four parts of wood alcohol and one part of pyridine bases and proper coloring matter, known as "completely denaturized alcohol" or "mineralized denaturized alcohol," to be sold freely without restriction after it leaves the hands of the manufacturer.

These provisions in force would give the manufacturing industries a tremendous impetus, and would give the agricultural classes and those allied with them an inexhaustible supply of most excellent and satisfactory material for fuel, light, and power.

The provisions for the removal of the tax from denatured alcohol would, as a matter of course, be covered in the bill. The quantity and nature of denaturing material to be used, as well as the size of the distilleries to be licensed, and the regulations governing the supervision of its manufacture and sale could, of course, either be covered by specific legislation or left in the control of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. To my mind it would be altogether the wisest to do the latter. The regulations prescribed by the Department would naturally be elastic, and could be changed as necessity required without the delay of securing Congressional action. It appears to me that it would be very objectionable to legislate as to the exact quantity of denaturing material to be used, as it would leave the producers of denatured alcohol largely at the mercy of the wood-alcohol people, who could probably advance the price at their pleasure. On the other hand, if the regulations were in the hands of the Department, an advance in price could be met by a reduction in quantity, and the authority of the Department would act as governor.

So broad is the field opened by this proposition that I find I have only scratched it here and there. With inexhaustible raw material at hand, which can be so easily converted, virtually permitting every farmer to grow his fuel in his fields, and in turn permitting him to return the by-product to his fields, to again enrich them, who shall say nay to this proposition?

Who can, in the fact of the facts, find it in his mind, or in his heart to refuse to relieve the people of this broad land from the heavy hand of the powers that control unrelentingly the price of our liquid fuel and light supplies?

The proposition for the removal of the tax is negative in its character. We are working under abnormal conditions now, growing out of the necessities for revenue during and after the war, and the proposition now is to return to normal.

For over forty years we have stood in a false attitude toward certain of our home industries, fostering tenderly the producers of wood alcohol, illuminating and fuel oils, and gasoline, by maintaining a prohibitive revenue tax against alcohol, the only material that could successfully compete with them.

Furthermore, by means of this same tax we have throttled the producers of our chemicals and chemical products, and have sat idly by amidst a veritable revolution in the chemical world, permitting Germany to grow to the first rank in the manufactures allied with chemistry, while our similar industries in the meantime have stood palsied and shackled.

The proposition is, then, so far as these industries are concerned, to go back over forty years and begin where we left off and regain as best we may the lost ground.

While the progress of many of our industries has been thwarted and handicapped by our false economic policy, I am happy to say, Mr. Chairman, that the agricultural interests, as yet, have not suffered so directly under these conditions, and to them this change will mean a step forward and will lead the way to renewed prosperity, added comforts, increased happiness.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman from North Dakota a question. From your study of this question you believe this denatured alcohol could be made as to cost not to exceed 12 cents per gallon. Is that true?

Mr. MARSHALL. Yes; that is true—12 to 15 cents per gallon.

Mr. GRONNA. Would not this be a means of furnishing the American farmers and those who live in the rural districts cheap oil for fuel and light and power, and would it not also create a market for the grain that the farmer raises?

Mr. MARSHALL. It certainly would.

Mr. GRONNA. And would it not also create a market for the wood alcohol people, to denature the grain alcohol?

Mr. MARSHALL. Yes; it would. Mr. Chairman, returning to my subject where I was interrupted, I want to say in this connection I am moved to quote the beautiful and forceful language of my colleague and friend the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK]:

> The farm of to-day is beyond what Greeley could have fancied forty years ago when he boasted of agriculture's advancement.
> The modern farmer is the manager of an estate, with ledger record of outgo and income and balances. He supervises in the midst of motors and machinery, delves in the mysteries of chemistry, of seed selection, of soil formation, soil enrichment and cultivation.
> Books and magazines are on his shelves, a telephone is at his elbow, the newspaper is delivered daily at his door.
> Practically all the creature comforts of city life are his. Three are in part denied him; one, a satisfactory light to rank with gas and electricity; another, a cheap, safe, and easily transported fuel, and the other, means of refrigeration. The last, chlorine added to denatured alcohol might bring him. The better light and the cheaper fuel, a large proportion of the 6,000,000 farmers believe will undoubtedly come to them through an enactment which will remove the tax from denatured alcohol.

These eloquent words of my friend have a pleasing ring of hope, truth, and sincerity in my ears, and the vivid picture they paint gladdens my heart. They herald to me the coming of the time when the flow of the tide of humanity from the country to the city will halt and turn back from the city to the country; the time when the city man will look with longing eyes out to the country, where dwells his more fortunate brother close to nature and yet amidst all the conveniences of modern civilization. They signal to me the near approach of an era when the real producers of actual wealth will come into their own and enjoy the full fruition of their toil; when the highest type of civilization will be exemplified in the men and women on the farm. Let us speed the day. [Prolonged applause.]

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, last week during the discussion of the Indian Appropriation bill the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], in a few well-chosen remarks, pointed out to the committee the great industrial menace that the Japanese are to be in the near future to this country. Those remarks interested me greatly. Probably no part of the United States is more conscious of the existence of that menace than are the people of the Pacific coast. They realize fully that whether they stay at home and devote their energies to production there or whether they immigrate to this country and devote their energies to production here the Japanese are bound to be a great menace; but the people of California, for whom I undertake to speak, if they are to meet that menace, prefer to meet it on the soil of Japan rather than on our own soil.

In obedience to a popular demand there were introduced in this House early in the session two bills—one by Mr. MCKINLAY, of the Second district of California, and one by myself—having for their object the extension of the provisions of the Chinese-exclusion acts to embrace the Japanese and Koreans. I might say incidentally that the principle embodied in these bills has the unanimous approval of the delegation from the State of California. I think I speak conservatively when I say that these bills voice the desire of at least 95 per cent of the people of my district, if not 95 per cent of all the people of the State of California.

I will not take the time of this House further to refer to these bills. They simply, in terms, extend the provisions of the Chinese-exclusion acts to embrace the Japanese and Koreans.

In discussing at this time the question of the exclusion of certain classes of the Japanese from our shores, and particularly those of the cooly class, I am undertaking a not altogether pleasant duty. All men admire courage. The valorous achievements of any nation have in all ages challenged the admiration of the world. And when a weaker nation, making up for its lack of numbers by its energy, courage, and discipline, emerges from a contest with a nation numerically much stronger with the triumphant success which has recently attended the arms of Japan in its contest with Russia we, in common with the rest of the world, shout our bravos to the plucky little island nation. In what I shall say upon this question I wish not to be understood as detracting in the least from the credit due the Japanese people for what in the past half century they have accomplished in war and peace. Their achievements, which are not small, are the common heritage of mankind, and for that reason I glory in them. I would not that the United States should put one obstacle in the way of the progress of our sister nation. Rather I would help her in her upward and onward march all that we can without injury to ourselves.

The question raised by the bill to which I have referred is in no sense an international one. It is purely local in character. The right of every nation to regulate without interference the coming of aliens into its territory has been universally recognized in every age of the world's history. It is a right that we as a nation have claimed and exercised in the past and still claim and exercise. The question of Japanese exclusion should therefore be settled not as a question of international law, but solely as a question of domestic policy. Is it better for this nation that the Japanese people should be allowed to come and settle among us as we allow aliens of the Caucasian race to come, or is it better for the whole people of our country that they should be wholly or partly excluded? This question answered and the whole matter should be regarded as settled.

And this question can not be wisely answered by simply pointing to the great achievements of the Japanese people in war. Fighting qualities are not the only—not even the chief—elements necessary to be considered in this connection. The main considerations are these: What stamp of civilization will these people bring to us when they come to our shores? What elements of personal character have they that if stamped somewhat upon our already composite national character would add elements of strength not now possessed by us? What elements that would tend to weaken or corrupt the national life? Would their coming tend to threaten our institutions or destroy the civilization founded upon intelligence, morality, equality, and justice that we are trying with some success to build up here? I believe that these are some of the questions that we should ask and answer; these are the principal considerations that should determine our attitude toward this question.

The Japanese have made such strides and have been outwardly so transformed in the past fifty years that those of our fellow-citizens who only know them from a distance are apt to be filled with unmixed admiration. A personal contact close enough and long enough to pierce the outside veneer gives one an entirely different impression, however. A close acquaintance shows one that unblushing lying is so universal among the Japanese as to be one of the leading national traits; that commercial honor, even among her commercial classes, is so rare as to be only the exception that proves the reverse rule, and that the vast majority of the Japanese people do not understand the meaning of the word "morality," but are given up to practice of licentiousness more generally than any nation in the world justly making any pretense to civilization. I am told by those who have lived in Japan and understand its language that there is no word in Japanese corresponding to "sin," because there is in the ordinary Japanese mind no conception of its meaning. There is no word corresponding to our word "home," because there is nothing in the Japanese domestic life corresponding to the home as we know it. "The Japanese language has no term for 'privacy.' They lack the term and the clear idea because they lack the practice."

As showing the Japanese as we have him in California, let me quote a few eminent authorities in support of what I have said and shall say of some of his leading characteristics.

Prof. James A. B. Scherer, now president of Newberry College, South Carolina, and for many years a teacher in the Government schools of Japan, says:

> The Japanese have changed in outward appearance so thoroughly that many have been deceived into believing the change complete, and that a nation can be really born in a day. * * * Certainly there has been no inner transformation commensurate with the outward. Japan has a renaissance, but not a reformation. Over the hot and still active fires of traditional sentiment, ethic emotions, and hereditary customs a thin crust of modern western civilization has been laid. The crust is the appearance; the unassuaged but concealed interior fires are the dominant reality. Deceived travelers, sometimes with the best of intentions, confuse manners with morals, outward refinement with religion, and civilization with Christian conduct. Because they see outward polish they argue to a change of heart. * * * There could be no greater mistake.

And again:

> Let us, for the present, pass by the fact that commercial integrity is almost unknown among the majority of Japanese merchants; that it is a rare thing for native dealers to keep their contracts, and go on to the deeper things of the heart and life.

Sidney L. Gulick, in the Evolution of Japan, published in 1903, says:

> The distressing state of the family life may also be gathered from the large numbers of public and secret prostitutes that are to be found in all the large cities and the singing girls in nearly every town. According to popular opinion their number is rapidly increasing.

And again:

> Every occidental remarks on the untruthfulness of the Japanese. Lies are told without the slightest apparent compunction.

And again:

> Public as well as secret prostitution has enormously increased during the last thirty or forty years. * * * Although the sale of daughters for immoral purposes is theoretically illegal, yet, in fact, it is of frequent occurrence.

A distinguished writer in the Contemporary Review for May, 1905, says:

> The Japanese traders, as a class, have, according to the universal verdict of those who deal with them, to this day the unsavory reputation of absolute unreliability in the fulfillment of any obligation; of having failed to acquire in their commercial transactions even the most elementary principles of common honesty.

Concubinage is common in Japan and is quite generally limited only by the extent of one's financial ability. It has of late been rapidly increasing, although now not recognized by law. Since the law takes no notice of it, the public statistics do not show it.

I am aware that friends of Japan have recently attempted to show by Japanese public statistics that these things are not true, and some of her statesmen indignantly deny that Japan is as bad as she has been painted. But these statistics are valueless for this purpose, because of the way they are gathered. Personal contact with Japanese, as well as reports made to me by recent visitors to Japan, some of them Members of this House who visited Japan last summer, make me know that prodigious lying, commercial dishonesty, and awful licentiousness are still pretty general Japanese characteristics. I am aware that some of Japan's noblest patriots and most distinguished citizens are openly fighting these great national evils, but thus far apparently without result.

The Yoshiwara still exists in Tokyo, and its inmates are increasing rather than diminishing. This is a colony of tens of thousands of women, most of them sold into this slavery for a term of years by their parents, with its streets and avenues, fountains, trees, and flowers. The Yoshiwara is only a type of some half dozen other colonies in Tokyo and of others in the other cities of Japan. These women are by no means considered as totally lost and abandoned, but are visited quite freely by the members of their families, including women and children, apparently without much thought of moral contamination or disgrace. Everywhere—upon the streets, in the bazaars, and in the hotels—one meets licentious suggestions, even direct invitations, and often from boys and girls of quite tender years. The most deplorable thing about this awful licentiousness is that it seems not to be condemned by public opinion or the Japanese religions. Phallus worship, with its licentious rites was, until recently, very common in Japan.

I know that there are thoroughly honest and moral Japanese people, with high and pure ideals, but at present they are but a small minority of the Japanese nation. I also know that very, very few of this small minority come to the United States. In California we are getting the poorest and lowest of the Japanese population—mostly the cooly class of laborers. They bring with them, of course, their habits of thought and life. These laborers are unreliable. They will generally leave the employer without a moment's notice and without any care for the interests of the latter whenever they find it to their own interest to do so.

Mr. Chairman, the civilization and personal characteristics that I have only briefly hinted at are what thousands of Japanese are yearly bringing to the Pacific coast. I have said so much to show that their civilization is distinctively oriental. We are already sensibly feeling in California their contaminating influence. And yet when some of us raise our voices in warning and protest, because we see the impending danger to our State and its people of the large and constantly increasing flow of these people to our shores, there are those who cry "race fanatic," who aver that we are narrow, and who insist that the menace which we see looming large upon our western horizon is only a figment of a diseased imagination. It has been said to me on the floor of this House that no one was objecting to the coming of the Japanese except a few labor agitators and perhaps the labor unions of the Pacific coast. I find these sentiments quite general here in the East and even upon this floor.

Mr. Chairman, if I may be allowed a personal statement, I wish to say that while it is my duty and pleasure to represent upon this floor the laboring men of my district, I speak also as an employer of labor; I speak as one striving honestly to represent all the varied interests of the State which I have the honor in part to represent upon the floor of this House. I appeal to the membership of this House to listen and ponder the few facts that I am bringing to their attention, and to hear the cry that our people are sending up for protection from a most real and present impending danger to their moral and material welfare.

Let us now look for a moment at the present commercial and industrial condition of the Japanese people, and consider the probable effect in the immediate future of these conditions upon their immigration to the United States.

The Japanese Empire embraces 147,655 square miles of territory. Of this small territory, less than the State of California, only 15.7 per cent is arable land, including plains and pasture lands. Excluding plains and pasture land, only 12.9 per cent, or 19,150 square miles, is actually arable, the balance being mountains. And yet in this small compass, according to the census of 1899, 44,260,000 Japanese live. In the light of these facts one can understand why the Japanese would fight a great nation in order to get room in which to expand.

These are some of the wages, expressed in our money, paid for the different kinds of labor in Japan in 1904, according to the report of the Japanese commissioners to the St. Louis Exposition:

Farm laborers (average), 16 cents per day.
Laborers in silk culture (average), 16½ cents per day.
Operatives for reeling silk (average), 10 cents per day.
Farm laborers, by the year, male, $16.
Farm laborers, by the year, female, $8.50.
Metal miners (average), 13½ cents per day.
Coal miners (average), 12 cents per day.
Timbermen (average), 11 cents per day.
Mill hands (average), 8½ cents per day.
Smelterers (average), 10 cents per day.
Factory employees, male, 15 cents per day.
Factory employees, female, 10 cents per day.
Tobacco factory employees, male, 22½ cents per day.
Tobacco factory employees, female, 10 cents per day.
Machine shops, 27½ cents per day.
Carpenters and plasterers, 29½ cents per day.
Stone masons, 33½ cents per day.
Shoemakers, 25 cents per day.
Tailors, Japanese clothes, 22½ cents per day.
Tailors, foreign clothes, 25 cents per day.
Skilled artisans, 50 cents per day.

Mr. FASSETT. Is that in gold?

Mr. HAYES. That is in our money.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Do those figures include the feeding of these Japanese?

Mr. HAYES. They do not include feeding them.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The wages for the farm laborers do?

Mr. HAYES. They probably do, but not the others.

With the crowded condition of Japan and the low wages prevailing there, is it any wonder that her laboring people are coming to our shores in increasing numbers to take advantage of the great opportunity which this country in its present state of prosperity offers to them? They are now landing at the port of San Francisco at the rate of about 1,000 per month. This, you may say, is not very serious. But every one of these thousand monthly immigrants takes a job that would otherwise be given to a white man, and the matter becomes even more serious when you consider the rapid increase in this immigration in the past six years. Up to 1900 but few Japanese had come to this country. In that year 12,635 came, and since 1900, 76,737 Japanese have landed in this country, and this has come about without any artificial stimulant.

The fear of what will undoubtedly happen when the immigration agent begins to put in his work, as he is doing it in southern Europe, is filling the mind of the people of the Pacific coast with apprehension. The thought of what will happen when some of the big Chinese companies now supplying different parts of the world with Chinese coolies awake to the possibilities in the shipping of Japanese coolies to this country is making the people of all classes in California desire that something be done to provide against this certain danger.

The following news item gives some idea of what is taking place in Hawaii at this time, and the same system is sure to be worked on a larger scale in the United States unless our people are aroused to the danger and take steps to prevent it:

JAPANESE POUR INTO HAWAII.

[Special cable to the Call.]

HONOLULU, February 21, 1906.

There is every reason to believe that the immigration laws are being violated in a wholesale fashion at this port. The plantations have been importing Japanese laborers in great numbers. Two thousand have been brought to the islands already this year, and 500 more are due to-morrow on the steamship Hongkong Maru, from Japan. From here the laborers are taken by small steamships direct to the plantations in various parts of the islands. It is believed that contagious diseases have by this means been introduced into the Territory.

At a conference to-day Acting Governor Atkinson denounced the methods of the planters. He demanded that they give land in fee simple to European immigrants, according to the views of President Roosevelt. The Washington Government gives authority to a Territorial board to promote immigration, but the planters have worked independently, securing their laborers through Japanese companies.

But what of Korea and Manchuria? Will they not be more enticing to Japanese emigrants now than the United States? No. Manchuria is already more thickly populated than the Pacific coast of the United States, and the population of Korea is nine times as dense as that of California. Besides, the same low wages await the Japanese emigrant to these countries as prevail in Japan and all the oriental nations. Korea and Manchuria may offer tempting opportunities to the commercial classes of Japan, but being already supplied with a surplus of cheap labor, they do not offer any great inducement to the Japanese emigrant laborer. Many Korean laborers, on the contrary, are seeking relief from the crowded conditions in their own country, and with their Japanese neighbors are looking to the United States, where ten times the wages await them that can be had in any oriental country. Several thousand Koreans, mostly laborers, came to Hawaii last year.

As indicating what is likely—almost certain—to happen in the next twenty-five years, in the absence of an exclusion law, let us look at some of the European countries and the percentages of their own population they have been sending to us:

Table showing the percentages of the populations of the European countries named who have emigrated to the United States during the past twenty-five years.

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| England | per cent | 3½ |
| Ireland | do | 26 |
| Scotland | do | 5½ |
| German Empire | do | 4½ |
| Norway | do | 18½ |
| Sweden | do | 15 |
| Austria-Hungary | do | 4½ |
| Italy | do | 6½ |
| Switzerland | do | 4½ |

In none of these countries, except possibly Ireland, were the conditions for the past twenty-five years so favorable for a large emigration to this country as they are to-day in Japan. The lowest country in the above table in the per cent of her population which came to us in the past twenty-five years is England. She sent us 3½ per cent of her total population. If Japan should in the next twenty-five years send us no more than 3½ per cent of her population, 1,438,000 Japanese would land in this country before the end of the year 1930, and the result would be that practically every laborer except those of the most skilled classes would be driven off the Pacific coast. If Japan in the next twenty-five years should send us the same proportion of her population as Italy has in the past twenty-five years, or 6½ per cent—and why not, unless prevented by our laws?—2,750,000 Japanese would land on our shores—enough to practically sweep the entire country west of the Rocky Mountains clean of white laborers. As is well known, no white man can compete with the Japanese laborers. They are satisfied to be housed in such cramped and squalid quarters as few white men in any part of the world could live in, and the food that keeps them in condition would be too cheap and poor to satisfy the most common labor in this country. Besides, the large percentage of Japanese immigrants have no families to provide for and no children to educate.

So much for the future possibilities of danger. But it does not all lie in the future. According to the census of 1900 there were in this country 72,171 Chinese and 24,530 Japanese. It is probable that these figures are not far from representing the number of Chinese now here.

Since the last census year about 90,000 Japanese have landed. Although some of these have returned to Japan, it is certain that there are more Japanese in this country to-day than Chinese, and that the total Mongolian population is more than 150,000, an increase of 100 per cent in the last six years in the Mongolian population. Nearly half of this population is in California, and when it is considered that almost every one of these Mongolians is a wage-earner, it is plain what this means to the laboring people of our State. They are already feeling the competition of this cheap labor, and in some lines of work the Mongolians have entirely driven out the white laborers. For example, Watsonville, just outside my district, in Santa Cruz County, is a rich center of apple and berry growing. A few years ago a large number of white people were pleasantly and profitably employed in the orchards and berry fields. To-day, I believe, about 2,000 Japanese are employed practically the year through, to the entire exclusion of the whites. In my own county one of the leading industries is seed farming. Here, too, the white man has been entirely displaced by several hundred Chinese and Japanese laborers. The conditions are the same in other places and avocations. The following statement shows something of the conditions in San Francisco. It is made up from statistics compiled by the Japanese and Korean Exclusion League of that city.

Mr. FASSETT. Are you giving statistics, to be extended in the RECORD, of the wages received in San Francisco by the laboring classes?

Mr. HAYES. Yes; I am giving statistics showing the relative wages of the Mongolian, especially the Japanese, and the white man. And I want to say, in passing, that these statistics were gathered by the Japanese and Korean Exclusion League, of San Francisco. I can not vouch for their accuracy, but have no doubt that they are substantially correct.

Mr. FASSETT. You have a bureau of labor statistics in California?

Mr. HAYES. Yes. These have been gathered and brought very nearly down to date.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Would the gentleman prefer not to be interrupted at this time?

Mr. HAYES. I do not object at all to being interrupted by a question.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I have no desire to cut into this very splendid speech which the gentleman is delivering, and which is full of interesting matter. Have you suggested a remedy anywhere?

Mr. HAYES. I did; at the beginning.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I am sorry I did not hear it. Will you please answer me this question, if I do not embarrass you?

Mr. HAYES. Not at all.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. What do you think the result will be if we should exclude the Japanese from this country? Do you not think that, like the Crusaders, we would be tired of our pilgrimage abroad and would come home to reign?

Mr. HAYES. That is what I desire to do.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. If you exclude the Japanese from our shores, what do you think will become of us in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. HAYES. That is a matter that is not concerning me just now, but I am more concerned about what will become of us at home.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. That is a thing that should concern us all.

Mr. HAYES. I think I understand the gentleman, that if we exclude the Japanese, we will have trouble with the Japanese nation. If that is true, that is one good reason why we should exclude them. I do not think the time has come, Mr. Chairman, when this country can be dictated to by any foreign power as to what its domestic policy shall be; and that would have no weight with me, and I hope it would not with the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I do not know that it should; but the terrible results which would come, it seems to me, ought perhaps to enter into the discussion is the reason I asked my friend the question.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I have given some thought to that question. I do not think anything terrible would result at all. I believe the reigning class of Japan would be very glad to keep their laborers at home or near home. I do not think they desire that they should come to this country in any large numbers.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from California has been interrupted, I would like to ask him if he has considered what effect the restriction of Japanese emigration would have on the twenty-five or thirty millions of trade we have with that country. In other words, what effect it would have on us?

Mr. HAYES. I do not think it would have any appreciable effect. I do not see why it should. I see it stated in the public press, in the line of the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the Emperor and the statesmen of Japan are opposed to emigration of Japanese to this country.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Can not they prevent it?

Mr. HAYES. I see it also stated that the Japanese consul at Hawaii, according to the statement I read, referring to the large immigration of Japanese coming to Hawaii, tried to prevent them going there, and especially tried to prevent them coming to this country. I suppose he must have been acting under the directions of the home Government, otherwise he would not have done so. So that I think no trouble need be anticipated from that source at all.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Would not the ruling powers of Japan, then, have the power to prevent emigration?

Mr. HAYES. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Then why should we entangle ourselves in any way, I should ask my friend?

Mr. HAYES. We should not unless it imperils us in some way or becomes a menace to our citizenship; unless that emigration continues to increase as it has. You understand there is no direct opposition to the educated class of Japanese.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I should say not.

Mr. HAYES. But it has probably not yet reached the point where the Government of Japan has passed any laws with reference to emigration to the United States. It has not reached sufficient magnitude yet; but I have no doubt, as in the case of the Chinese, that if this Government should take the matter up with Japan it could be arranged amicably. You understand, Mr. Chairman, that our people are not objecting to the coming of Japanese of the educated classes. Our only objection is to the coming of the coolie class, the laborers, who not only compete with our white labor at home but drive them out, take their homes away from them of necessity, because they can not live on the wages the Japanese can thrive upon, because they bring another civilization into our midst and degrade especially our rising generation. These are the principal reasons we object to Mongolians of any kind.

Mr. ESCH. Is it the understanding of the gentleman that this exclusion of Japanese would extend to the Isthmus of Panama?

Mr. HAYES. My idea of this exclusion is simply that it should affect our own home people.

Mr. ESCH. Would the passage of this exclusion act have any effect on Japanese taking employment on the Isthmus?

Mr. HAYES. None whatever.

I ought to say, in passing, that this table which I shall ask leave to print shows that the wages of the Japanese are not only lower than those of the white laborer, but they are lower than those of the Chinaman. When it comes to a matter of competition between the Chinese and the Japanese the Japanese can cut them out every time, because they can live on less than any other human being in the world. The Japanese has the science of living at a minimum reduced to the finest point of any nationality that I know of in the world. I ought to say also that this statement shows that the hours of working are very much longer in the case of the Japanese laborer than in the case of the American, showing fourteen hours, and often sixteen hours, as a day's work, where an American white man works from eight to eleven hours.

STATEMENT OF WAGES, HOURS OF LABOR, AND CONDITIONS IN SAN FRANCISCO.

"Sailors.—It is said that there are about 2,700 Mongolians employed on American vessels sailing from Pacific coast ports; but from a gentleman who has made a close study of the subject, and who has a list of numbers employed on each vessel, we have received information which convinces us that there are no less than 3,500 Mongolians competing with American seamen on vessels sailing from Pacific coast ports. From the same source we learn that the Army and Navy employ about 1,000 of the same kind of "cheap labor."

Butchers.—They are confronted with the employment of 200 Chinamen, who work about sixteen hours a day, compared with ten of the white butcher. The Chinese handle about 75 per cent of all the pork slaughtered in the city, and the white butchers handling pork, with the exception of sausage makers, who receive "union wages," are compelled to work for 25 to 50 per cent less money than those engaged in other branches of the trade. Ten of the Chinese butchers belong to the Butchers' Board of Trade.

It is further stated that meats unfit for human consumption can be obtained at all times in Chinatown, and from those shops the Japanese restaurants and boarding houses obtain most of the meat supplied to their patrons.

Broom makers.—The Chinese have virtually destroyed competition in that industry by means of the cheap and inferior goods made by them. The white broom maker works nine hours for a wage of $2.50; the Chinaman works from ten to fourteen hours, his wage ranging from 75 cents to $1.25 per day.

Garment cutters.—Twenty to thirty Chinese employed at a maximum rate of $2 per day, white men receiving $3.50. In many instances "unionism and public opinion" have caused manufacturers to displace the Chinese by white cutters.

Iron molders.—Three Japs were employed for seven months by a company at Point Richmond, which subsequently failed; wages $12 per week. They lived in a small cabin, their diet being rice and beans. Skill good for the time they worked, but they showed no regard for sanitary rules.

From the Stockton laundry workers.—We receive information that they are in competition with 200 Chinese and 20 Japs. Hours of labor of whites, ten; of the Chinese and Japanese, sixteen to twenty hours. Wages, whites $1.25 to $3 per day; the wages paid the Chinese and Japanese can not be ascertained. Five-eighths of the laundry work is being done by the Mongolians and the white worker is being constantly reminded by his employer of the difficulty he experiences in competing with Mongolians. Chinese and Japanese work is stated to be much inferior to the white and much cheaper. That is the essence of the desire for Japanese labor, "cheapness."

We now come to the most interesting and important information that has been furnished your committee by means of the returned papers—that of the cooks, cooks' helpers, and waiters.

From the cooks it is learned that the number of Chinese employed will vary according to the season—150 to 300; Japanese, from 400 to 1,000.

Hours of labor.—Union, from ten and one-half to thirteen; Chinese, from fourteen to sixteen; Japanese, the same as Chinese.

Wages.—Union, $15 to $25 for six days; Chinese and Japanese, from $25 to $35 per month, without any day off during the week. Work very poor, especially in the houses run by Japanese, where the meals are very cheap (usually 10 cents) and which entice a certain class of custom to extend them patronage.

Wages for white men.—Cooks, $60 to $90; waiters, $40; miscellaneous help, $32.50. Japanese cooks, $35; waiters, $30; miscellaneous help, $20. The delegates may draw their own conclusions as to the reasons for employing Japs and as to how long the white man will be able to hold his own against such competition.

Pile drivers and bridge builders.—It is learned that the cooks and their helpers in the railroad construction and repair camps are chiefly Chinese and Japanese, but no data was furnished relative to wages and hours of labor.

Cooks' helpers are working in competition with 200 to 300 Chinese and from 500 to 600 Japanese, according to the time of the year.

Wages.—White helpers receive $8 for a week of 6 days. Chinese work 7 days of 14 hours each for $5. The Japanese day is also 14 hours for 7 days in the week, but he only receives $4, his competition being disastrous even to the Chinese.

Waiters.—The Chinese restaurants, of which 36 are noted, employ 180 of their own countrymen. Of the Japanese there are employed 1,200 by the month in boarding houses, saloons, and Japanese restaurants, of which there are about 67.

Hours of labor.—Union men, 10; women, 9. Chinese average 13; Japanese average 14.

Wages.—Union men (minimum), $10.50; women, $7. Chinese average $6 to $7; the Japanese from $4 to $5. Thus we see that at every point of contact the Japanese can discount the Chinaman.

Shoe workers.—A short while since a count was made of the Japanese shoe stores, repair shops, etc., and no less than 286 were counted. Since then many stores have been opened in various localities, which we believe would add, at the very least, 25 to that number. Each shop has a boss and one apprentice, sometimes two or three; they work early and late. We have seen them working at 6 a. m. and at 10 p. m. They charge all the traffic will bear, except when located in close proximity to a white man; then the figures will be cut in half until competition ceases.

Garment workers.—There have been visited 72 stores, employing 769 hands—all turning out goods to be sold to our wives and daughters—wages from $4 per week to $60 per month, according to the class of work; and, mind you, these rates do not include grub; that they must furnish themselves. Some of the establishments eat, sleep, cook, and perform their natural functions all in the same room.

The census report for 1900 says that there were 12,528 Mongolians employed in San Francisco at that date, segregated as follows:

|---|---|
| Laborers | 697 |
| Laundry workers | 2,087 |
| Servants | 3,054 |
| Merchants (retail) | 1,327 |
| Porters | 97 |
| Salesmen | 256 |
| Seamstresses (men) | 249 |
| Shoes and repairs | 274 |
| Machine operators | 363 |
| Shirts and collars | 205 |
| Tailors | 501 |
| Cigars and tobacco | 727 |

That the percentage of employed has increased according to the increase of immigration, we are sure.

The Report of the Commissioner of Labor for 1904 says that 93 per cent of the Mongolians were employed in gainful occupations and the investigations conducted by us show that there is not a business but what is affected by the Japanese competition; that the Japanese furnish each other with everything that is essential to their domestic and industrial existence—banking, printing, medicine, dentistry, teaming, peddling, all kinds of merchandise—in fact, every industry necessary to maintenance of urban life has its Japanese representatives, and they buy and sell and trade with each other, and no white storekeeper, not even a saloon, benefits one dollar by their presence in San Francisco or California.

Building trades.—For the purpose of securing information concerning the inroads likely to be made by the Japanese on the building trades, Dr. Carl Saalfield submitted plans for a house he contemplated building to Japanese architects and contractors with the following results:

He found that the Japanese have entered into all of the thirty-four trades connected with the building of a modern house. He found that they would build a house for $2,000 less than the lowest bid from an American firm. That bid was $5,800. The Japanese offered to build it for $3,800. They would do everything from the excavating to the plumbing, gas-fitting, painting, and decorating—turning over the keys for a finished house. The Doctor, thinking there had been some mistake, went over the plans with them, even to the tile laying, but they stood by their figures. They pay their carpenters $1.50 per day and their laborers about 60 per cent less than a white laborer receives. The item for common labor had been figured by the American at $700—the Japanese figured it at $250.

In Alameda County they have done much cement work, and good work too, but at a figure which a white man can not touch and live.

Social conditions.—All that has ever been said in Congress by the advocates of Chinese exclusion during the past forty years; all that has ever been written on the subject; all the information that has been collected and buried out of sight in Congressional committee reports as to the vileness and bestiality of oriental vices, is as true of the Japanese in our midst as of the Chinese.

Viewed from our standpoint, they have no social standard; they have no morals; their women occupy a very inferior position; many of them are held merely as chattels and for immoral purposes and just as long as they are profitable to their masters. It is even susceptible of proof that many of the women so held in bondage are operated on in infancy so as to fit them for their vile calling and to prevent the inconvenience of childbearing.

From an inspection of a dozen houses occupied by Japanese, it was learned by the health officers that the occupants were living in a condition so utterly opposed to American conceptions of cleanliness and decency as to be a positive menace to public health.

Their unclean habits had left their marks on the walls; the noisome odors were unbearable, and the extreme filthiness disclosed caused the officers to declare that the conditions existing in those buildings were a menace to life and health."

Now, Mr. Chairman, naturally the laboring men of the Pacific coast are objecting to this kind of competition, and justly so. Of late it has become quite the fashion in certain quarters to sneer at one who ventures to speak of the demands and of the rights of labor, and especially of union labor. We have become accustomed to hear of union despotism and union arrogance, and have heard the labor trust of late condemned with the other trusts that infest the land. I am not here to defend injustice or unreasonable commercial demands, no matter by whom practiced or made, but in the contest against cheap foreign labor my sympathies are all with the laborers of the United States.

When the laborer with American ideals—with a home to maintain, a family to support, and children to educate—sees his job taken by a man wholly alien in race, with no family ties or responsibilities, and who, by the laws of our country, can never be admitted to the responsibilities of citizenship, he would not be worthy of the name of freeman if he did not fight for his home, his wife, and his children with every weapon at his command. He would be far from the intelligent laborer that he is reputed to be if he did not organize and join with his fellows to more effectually fight the common enemy. And every lover of his kind and every patriot should help him in this fight. The very existence of the Republic depends upon it. As the proportion of our citizens who work for wages increases it is becoming more and more important that the child of the laborer should be educated to understand and to bear properly responsibilities that will devolve upon him as a freeman, as one of the sovereigns of this great country. It is also more and more important with the passage of each year that the laborer should be made to feel that the Government of this country will deal justly, yea, generously with him, and that it will assist him to maintain every equitable right and protect him from every enemy who would destroy his home and his American standard of living. From every consideration this House should hear this protest of the laborers of the Pacific coast against Mongolian invasion. We should at least not deny their petition before it is heard or considered. The danger that threatens them is great and immediate. The spirit of immigration is rapidly taking possession of the Japanese mind, and in the immediate future the number coming to the Pacific coast will greatly increase.

But there are larger and more imperative reasons than any I have mentioned why we should close our gates firmly against all Mongolian immigration. It may be that the time may come when men of all nations will recognize the man of alien race as their brother and live with him in love and harmony. But that time is not yet. If it ever comes it will be far in the future. Race prejudice seems to be planted firmly in the average human nature. You may inveigh against it as barbaric and un-Christian, but this does not eradicate it. It would be foolish to shut our eyes to its almost universal presence.

The white people of the Pacific coast have no relations of a social nature with the Japanese now there, and it is not desirable that they should have. There is no mingling or fraternizing between the two races, while in the hearts of the white laborers this natural antagonism is rapidly growing into a feeling of enmity and hatred for the race which is taking away their means of subsistence by greatly underbidding them in the labor market. If the present influx of Asiatics continues, the race question will soon be more acute on the Pacific coast than it has been in the States of the South. We already have one race problem on our hands, the solution of which no man can see, and I aver that this is enough without importing another one. We confidently appeal to our brothers of the South who are wrestling with this great problem not to be a party to forcing a similar problem upon us of the Pacific coast.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from California that the South has always tried to stay by the Pacific coast on this question.

Mr. HAYES. I am quite aware of that, and I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that the Pacific coast appreciate the friendship and cooperation of the people of the South in this matter.

It has been urged that the labor necessities of the Pacific coast demand this Mongolian immigration. Why, they say, your fruit industry, your mines, your seed farms can not be worked and developed without them. It is better that they never should be developed than that our white laborers should be driven out or degraded by Mongolians. The same arguments were no doubt used a century or so ago to justify the bringing of African labor to this country. But there is no labor demand upon the Pacific coast that can not be fully met with white laborers, if conditions are made such that they will wish to come and remain there. No self-respecting white laborer will work beside the Mongolian upon terms that will be satisfactory to the latter. The proposition whether we shall have white or yellow labor on the Pacific slope must soon be settled, for we can not have both.

If Mongolians are allowed to freely come—and if they are they will come in large numbers—the white laborer will not go there. He will soon come to understand that that section of our country is no place for a laboring man, and he will shun it as he would a pestilence. And who can blame him? Would you wish to take up your residence permanently in Japan? Would you willingly subject your children as they grow to manhood and womanhood to the oriental environment, with its semibarbaric ideas and its stifling and filthy moral atmosphere? Yet what difference is there between living with the Japanese in Japan and permitting the Japanese to come and live with you in California?

A few years ago our people came to the Congress of the United States asking for protection against the evils that threatened them from incursions of large numbers of Chinese. When the conditions became understood the request was granted; the Chinese-exclusion acts were the answer. We are now asking for protection from a new danger, just as real and nearly as great as threatened us twenty-five years ago, and we shall keep on asking for protection from it until the generous people of the United States protect our children, our homes, our people by extending the Chinese-exclusion act to include all Mongolians. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, on the 21st of February quite accidentally I was precipitated into a controversy, or colloquy, rather, with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS] arising from his statement, which I knew to be erroneous, that nine-tenths of the Italians who come to this country are anarchists. Having knowledge that the statement was erroneous I thought it was only proper to draw his attention to what was really the fact. As sometimes happens in colloquies, the gentleman said something later that, perhaps, had he been making a set speech, he would not have said. Knowing him as I do, I realize that he would be the last man to criticise either a Commonwealth or a portion of a Commonwealth, and that therefore when he somewhat sneeringly said he did not come to New York for his ideals, I realized that he was in a large measure carried away by the heat of debate.

Nevertheless, as the remark was made, I think it proper at the first opportunity I have had to say a few words about New York, and to philosophize, perhaps, on the question of why the gentleman does not come to or stays away from the city of New York for his ideals.

I was particularly sorry to have a criticism from the State of Kentucky, of which State every American citizen ought to be so justly proud, which State was, in fact, the first emigrant State; over whose broad acres flowed the emigrants from the North, South, and East, forming in those early days the first State not based on some colony from across the sea. That mixture of the hardiest type from all our races, as they then were, has produced a race of tall, strong, able men, such, for instance, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] or the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BENNETT] who bears the same name as myself, and so far as personal habit and pulchritude is concerned I would extend the same remarks to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS] but for the fact that he was born in Virginia. Of the fair women of Kentucky the whole nation is proud, and the State of Lincoln and of Clay every true American must always hold in the highest regard.

I presume the gentleman from Kentucky was talking about illiteracy, his criticism being largely based on the alleged fact that we are an illiterate crowd in New York. So I looked up his district. He lives in Floyd County, Ky. The native whites there of voting age are 30.6 per cent illiterates—that is, unable to read and write. Nearly one-third of the men who vote in the county in which he lives. [Laughter.]

And then I looked up the county in which I have the honor to live, and a portion of which I represent, and found that in our native population, including negroes, who are slightly more illiterate with us than the whites, we had only six-tenths of 1 per cent of illiteracy. In other words, the gentleman's county is nearly sixty times as illiterate as ours. [Laughter.] Well, that is not quite fair. We have a mixed foreign population. Twelve and six-tenths per cent of the males of voting age of that population were illiterate according to the census of 1900.

But the gentleman from Kentucky's native-born whites of voting age were nearly three times as illiterate as our foreign-born voters, and to my utter amazement I found that in the formative period of the lives of the younger voters of Floyd County the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS] was for the space of more than five years school commissioner of that county. [Laughter.] So he can not criticise us on the ground of illiteracy with any degree of force. Then, as I have not had opportunity to do for a long time past in a somewhat busy life, I rather reviewed in my own mind what we have done of so disastrous, so far-reaching, and so reprehensible a nature that the gentleman from Floyd County would not come to us for his ideals.

Does he criticise our judiciary? The final test of a judiciary as between people of different parties is the action of that judiciary upon political questions—where questions between political parties are involved—and whether a man taken from the ranks of the bar, taken, as they usually are, from the ranks of active partisanship, can, when donning the ermine, sink the man and the partisan in the judge. So I looked up our history in that respect. I found that the last decision of an appellate court in our State where there was even the suspicion of politics in a case between political parties was in 1856. So in fifty years there has not a political question gone up to an appellate court in the State of New York where the judges have divided on party lines. We had thirteen or fourteen cases go up this last fall to our appellate court in the city of New York, which he criticises. There are Democrats and Republicans in that court. I do not now recall whether at that moment the majority sitting were Democrats or Republicans. Nobody paid any attention to the fact as to which party was in the ascendancy, and in every one of those fourteen cases, with Democrats and Republicans sitting in appeals involving Democrats and Republicans, the decision was the unanimous decision of the court. We had a question come up to our State court of appeals in 1891, involving the control of our State senate and the election of a United States Senator from that State, to which the gentleman will not go for his ideals.

Our appellate court, composed of both Democrats and Republicans, despite the fact that the pressure was tremendous, despite the fact that interest was intense, divided on lines outside of party, Republicans on both sides of the line, Democrats on both sides of the line, and decided the case according to the law as they construed it, and when a Democratic State canvassing board violated the orders of that court it was Democratic judges, one after the other, who issued the orders that punished them for such violation. So that our judiciary has not failed us in the city and in the State of New York. Some question might arise, and the gentleman raised one, as to the enforcement of the law, but before I go into that I desire to say that we have good laws in New York. When they issued a statement here recently about conditions in the city of Washington, anyone who will read it will find it said in that statement that our tenement law is a model for tenement-house laws. We passed a juvenile-court bill here yesterday. We have had one in New York for five years. We are at the front in things of that character. Are our laws enforced?

Well, the test of that is, is life and property secure in the city of New York? You can argue on that for days, but there is one thing you can not ever get away from. When a man makes a lot of money in any other part of the United States, he quite usually comes to spend the balance of his life and the balance of his money in New York City. [Laughter.] Now, if life and property were not secure, the man who valued both would not come to the city of New York to put either at the mercy of violence.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. Do people who go to New York because they have got money get more for their money than they do any place else?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Well, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman will have to ask that of somebody else. I am not in that favored class, but I will say, however, that I have never had any objection to what I get for my money in New York. I desire to say, incidentally, that there is one Senator who is building what I assume is a house in New York who I do not think is getting the worth of his money. [Laughter.]

But life and property are secure. I have lived in the State of New York all of my life, and in the county of New York for thirteen years. I have never seen the time that I found it necessary for the purpose of protection to carry even a jackknife. I have never known of a man in my circle of acquaintances that carried a weapon, except my friends on the police force. I will walk through any street in New York at any hour of the day or night, and as long as I pay attention to my own business I will walk through in safety. The gentleman said that we had strikes and troubles. We do have strikes, but we do not have violence. About a year ago 98 per cent of the operative force of the elevated and subway system walked out without a moment's notice, and within a week or ten days their places were supplied—I will not say filled, because they were not immediately filled by as good men. The headquarters of those strikers was within half a block of where I lived, and there was not a time during all the time that the strike lasted when the streets in the neighborhood of the headquarters of those strikers were even unpleasant for women and children. There was no violence, there were no troops called out. We have a police force in the city of New York, and we all of us feel concerning it a good deal like the man who was down in Habana when the war with Spain broke out. He was talking with some Spanish officers, and they said: "We have transports, we have troops, and we will load our troops on those transports and send them up there, and we will start the troops up Broadway, and then what will happen?" "Oh," said the New Yorker, "send them up and the Broadway squad will arrest them." [Laughter.]

We have in New York the best fire department in the civilized world. The brave deeds of these men convince us that the race of heroes has not died and that our good American stock has not deteriorated through the foreign influx. I will tell you why people have that impression in regard to violence and everything of that sort in New York. When you get more than 400 miles away from New York all that the newspapers print about New York is details of crimes and violence and alleged humorous sayings of some of our police magistrates. But I am calling attention to facts. In the county of New York the last time that we called out troops was thirty-five years ago—in 1871—and we have got lots of them in New York if we had to call them out, but we do not have the need. We have had strikes of various kinds. We have had longshoremen's strikes, we have had building trades strikes; we had 35,000 men out at once in the city of New York without a hint of violence. We have had strikes of teamsters, and other cities have had strikes of teamsters, and you have read about it in the newspapers. We have thousands of employees of printing offices out on strike now, and you do not know it because neither they nor the men who are attempting to take their places are violating the laws. We are an orderly people.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Certainly.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. You criticise, and very properly, too, the gentleman from Kentucky for the undemocratic and un-American ideas he expressed on the floor of this House on the 21st day of February last. Now, you follow that up by telling us of the peaceful conditions in New York under great stress, as in the case of strikes. Is it not a fact that the immigrant classes constitute a large portion of the labor classes of New York City, and that those immigrant classes have been found in New York City in the congested portions and elsewhere to be perfectly peaceful and law-abiding, anxious to learn, desirous of assimilating with the citizenship of New York——

Mr. BENNET of New York. May I interrupt the gentleman to ask whether he is making this speech or I am? [Laughter and applause.] So far as he has gone I entirely agree with him.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Answering the inquiry put by my friend and colleague from New York, I want to say I desire to bring the gentleman from New York back to the immigrant question.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Well, I have not got to it yet. I will get to it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman from New York pardon me a moment?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes; for a question; not for another speech.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. On the subject of workmen in New York City being engaged in labor strikes, as you say, at the present time, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the comment made by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BENNET of New York. If the gentleman will pardon me, I am going to come to that. I know what he has in mind.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. And the gentleman will yield later to me?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes.

So I think I have demonstrated that to a very large extent we enforce the laws in New York.

Now, what my friend from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] was trying to call my attention to was that the gentleman from Kentucky criticised us because we had such a large foreign population, and that they brought us strikes and pauperism and low wages; so I thought I would look that matter up, and I got the last bulletin of our State department of labor—an absolutely unbiased bureau which collects facts and does not deal very much in conclusions—and I found that during the months of July, August, and September, 1905, the 358,493 organized wage-workers reporting to the bureau of labor statistics averaged seventy-three days of employment, which was more than ever before in the history of the State, and there were only seventy-seven days in which they could work during that period, so that for all causes, their own desire (and this was the vacation season), lack of material, lack of work, sickness, and everything else, organized labor in New York during that period was only unemployed four days out of seventy-seven, and they received—and mind you this included apprentices, who get small wages, and it included some women who are not paid as high wages as men are—$246 wages, or an average of over a thousand dollars a year for labor, and I venture to say a much higher rate of wage than was paid in the county of Floyd, in the State of Kentucky.

The last figures I have about unskilled labor are for 1904, and show that for all classes, including boys and girls over 14 and women, wages had gone up from $1.13 per day to $1.39, but work was plentiful.

A MEMBER. What do they pay in Floyd?

Mr. BENNET of New York. The gentleman asks why I do not give what was paid down in the county of Floyd, and I will answer that it is because my heart is too tender. [Laughter.]

Furthermore, the gentleman said, in substance, "How about your sweat shops, where people toil for a mere pittance to keep body and soul together?" So I thought I would look up the sweat shops, and I found that between the years 1890 and 1900, in the clothing trade, which in its primary manufacturing sense is conducted largely in the sweat shops, so called, wages increased 46 per cent, and that during the month of July, 1905, wages were raised in those very sweat shops which he criticises from 10 to 20 per cent. It does not look very much as if they were toiling for a pittance, does it? I found also that where we used to import $14,000,000 worth of ready-made clothes yearly from Germany, we now import but $2,000,000. We have transferred an industry to our own country.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I think it is just to my colleague that the gentleman from New York should state what they are receiving, so that if my colleague desires to respond he will have the facts as stated by the gentleman from New York, to which he can make response.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes; I think that is only fair, and I will state it as well as I can. Those people are not paid a daily wage nor a weekly wage. They are paid by piecework; and when I sat for a brief period on the municipal court bench, and sat for one month in the district where they most largely live, I found—somewhat to my own astonishment, I must admit, for I had not so understood it up to that time—that the wages of the people that he said were striving for a mere pittance averaged over $20 a week. That is not a mere pittance, even in the city of New York—nor in the county of Floyd. [Laughter.] This, however, was not on the basis of an eight-hour day, and I have no exact statistics.

We had not been injured very much, so far as I had found, and so I thought I would look a little bit on the side of the taxpayer and see how he has been hurt in the last fifteen years by the deplorable conditions which my friend seems to think existed in the county of New York. And again I was surprised, for, in the engrossing duties of running for office almost every year and attending to my law business between campaigns and sessions, I had not kept up with these details.

In 1890 the assessed valuation of the county of New York was $1,618,000,000 in round figures, which is some considerable property. In 1905 that had increased from $1,618,000,000 to $4,575,000,000. That is an increase of nearly three billions on the assessed valuation of our property.

For the life of me I can not figure out why my friend from the county of Floyd could not come to New York for his ideals. The tone of our life is just as high, our material property is just as great, if not greater, our laws are enforced as well as they are in Floyd County, I undertake to say, or as well as they are in Breathitt County, Ky. And I would like to have read in my time a little clipping relating to that county in my friend's own district.

The Clerk read as follows:

JUDGE HARGIS INDICTED FOR MURDER OF MARCUM.

JACKSON, KY., February 24, 1906.

The Breathitt County grand jury returned indictments to-day against ex-Judge James Hargis and Sheriff Ed Callahan, charging them with the deliberate murder of James B. Marcum, an attorney, who was assassinated on the streets of Jackson.

B. F. French, John Smith, and John Abner were indicted as accessories. The indictments grew out of the famous Hargis-Cockrell feud which has caused so much bloodshed in Breathitt County.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Now, I will tell you the rest of that. Hargis was the county judge of that county. He had a difference of opinion with Marcum. Hargis was not the actual murderer of Marcum. He was too smart for that. Marcum was shot by a man named Curtis Jett, and I read in the newspapers only the other day that Curtis Jett, who shot down an officer of the court on the steps of the court-house in the county seat of Breathitt, is still at large, and worse than that——

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that Curtis Jett has been convicted and is serving a life sentence in the State penitentiary.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I am glad to be informed of that.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. And he is also the murderer of another party, and his other trial is set for some time in June.

Mr. BENNET of New York. May I ask another question? Is Curtis Jett serving that sentence for killing Marcum or killing somebody else?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I am not prepared to say. [Laughter.] He is serving a life sentence. I understood the gentleman's statement to be that he was at large. He is serving a life sentence in the State penitentiary now and is indicted in another case which is to be tried, I think, in June, and I do not know whether it is the Cockrill case or the Marcum case; but he is under a life sentence in the State penitentiary now.

Mr. BENNET of New York. It seems to me that Mr. Jett has been very busy in Breathitt County, and I think it is well he is serving a life sentence, from his record as disclosed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH]. At any rate, the point I wanted to make is well taken—that is, that Jett shot down an attorney in cold blood, and that though the shooting occurred nearly three years since he has not yet been tried for that particular crime; but an appalling thing about the matter is that Hargis and Callahan were renominated last fall for their respective offices. To the everlasting credit of the people of Breathitt County they were overwhelmingly defeated.

Now, the whole burden of the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky rested on his allegation of what he believed to be facts, for he is an earnest man, even although he did not have much success as school commissioner in Floyd County. [Laughter.] He thought, and thinks, that we are now in this alleged unfortunate condition because of immigration. He can have little personal knowledge of immigrants, as there are only 396 aliens, all told, in his district. There are many of us who are foreign-born in New York County. I am not myself. My ancestry dates back before 1750, so that I can speak dispassionately upon the subject. According to the census of 1900, 61.9 per cent of the people of New York City were born in foreign countries. Now, with all that number in the city, what is there to show that foreign immigration has hurt us? I want to say for the benefit of gentlemen who think as the gentleman from Kentucky does, in regard to immigration, that they have left out of account entirely what, in my judgment, is the most important thing in regard to immigration.

The original immigrant, who comes here over the age of 40, himself helps or hinders but little. It is the second generation, born of foreign parents, that counts in the United States; and we have that generation in New York City. It is not those adults who matter so much as it is the boys and girls born of those foreign parents, who start in our schools at the age of 5 or under, remain in our schools until they are 14—for there is no child labor in the State of New York—remain in our schools sometimes until they are 16, 18, or 19 years of age. In our free schools in the city of New York you can start a child in at 4½ years in the public kindergarten—and without expense to him, even for books—you send him right on through the schools and the high school until he graduates from the College of the City of New York with a splendid education. Two graduates of that college are Members of this House to-day. [Applause.]

That is what we have done. Gentlemen may say we are a bad people in New York; but we have stood there on the shore, where the ships came up from the great deep, and we have taken the man who did not have much money, because in the early days the man with money went farther west. We have taken the man burdened with a large family, who could not take them far west; we have taken the man who had just merely enough, just practically enough, to get to us and stay there, and out of him and out of his descendants we have made American citizens. What is this question of money alongside of good citizens? [Loud applause.] In the city of New York alone we spend $27,000,000 a year for education in our public schools, and if we need more we will spend more. [Applause.]

The State of New York, in her entire school system, is spending between $40,000,000 and $50,000,000; and the city of New York, burdened as they say by foreign immigration, contributes $125,000 a year under our State system of taxation to send money into the school districts up the State, where they have not a large number of foreign-born, as we have, and the foreign-born are helping stand the burden of the education of native-born children in the rural districts. And those rural districts are maintaining education nobly. They were assessing themselves as high as $25 on the thousand in the rural districts of New York so that every child in the Empire State could have an education.

Personally I wish to make this point: Immigration has not hurt us. I am not now talking about restriction; I am not now talking about selection. I am talking about the facts of the past and what immigration has done for us and the way it has built us up. The late Senator Hoar truly said:

> For many years a large majority of the people of the city of New York were of foreign birth or parentage. But how wonderfully most of these have grown in the elements of good citizenship and of honorable manhood, and how wonderfully their sisters and daughters have grown in the elements of womanhood. Freedom is the best school-teacher.

The Italian, the German, the Irishman, the Scandinavian, the Jew, the Hungarian, and all the rest, have all come in, and their children have come in, and in the second generation all of these races have mingled and built up a composite manhood and womanhood of which the State of New York can well be proud. [Applause.]

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16472—the legislative, judicial, and executive appropriation bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 58. An act to prevent the unlawful wearing of the badge or insignia of the Grand Army of the Republic or other soldier organizations;

H. R. 8103. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge between Fort Snelling Reservation and St. Paul, Minn.;

H. R. 122. An act to require the erection of fire escapes in certain buildings in the District of Columba, and for other purposes;

H. J. Res. 83. Joint resolution for a report, etc., upon the preservation of Niagara Falls;

H. R. 13398. An act to amend section 4400 of the Revised Statutes, relating to inspection of steam vessels;

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KEAN. I present a petition of the New Jersey Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, praying for the enactment of legislation relative to transportation of animals on railroads. The petition is short, and I ask that it be read and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the petition was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

[New Jersey Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.]

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The New Jersey Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, a society duly incorporated and chartered under the laws of New Jersey, respectfully represents that information has been received that a strong effort is being made to secure from the present Congress an alteration of the law relating to the transportation of animals on railroads, so that instead of the act which requires them to be fed and watered once in twenty-eight hours there shall be substituted an act increasing the time between feeding and watering to thirty-six hours. Such change of the law we believe would be conducive to great suffering, and would be not only detrimental to public health, but an outrage against humanity.

In behalf of the New Jersey Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.

Mr. CLAY. I present a petition of the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce, praying for the maintenance of the fast mail service between New York and New Orleans, via Washington, Atlanta, and Montgomery. The petition is short, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

The directors of the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce, representing the commercial interests of this city, which is one of the most important mail points in the South and the commercial center of the Southern States, respectfully petition your honorable body to continue the appropriation heretofore made for the maintenance of the fast mail service between New York and New Orleans, via Washington, Atlanta, and Montgomery.

This appropriation has been made by Congress for twelve years, and during the last two years the railroad companies carrying the mail over this route have, at their own expense, established a train exclusively devoted to the mail service, further shortening the time and improving the service which had been established by the aid of the appropriation.

This service is of vast importance to all of the territory between Washington and New Orleans and to other territory reached by side lines branching out from the main route. To withdraw the appropriation at this time would cripple the service and do very great harm to the business interests of this vast and growing territory, whose need for quick communication increases every day with the growth of population and the still more rapid growth of business.

We therefore petition your honorable body that the appropriation be continued.

The above unanimously adopted by the directors of the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce, Friday, March 9, 1906.

W. G. COOPER, Secretary.

Mr. CLAY presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Atlanta, Ga., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called "anti-injunction bill;" which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HANSBROUGH presented a petition of the North Dakota Drainage League, praying for the appointment of a joint commission to investigate the Red River of the North and its tributaries, and for an appropriation to defray the expenses thereof; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 14, 1906.

SHIPMENT OF LIVE STOCK.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration, by unanimous consent, of the bill (S. 3413) to prevent cruelty to animals while in transit by railroad or other means of transportation from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia into or through another State or Territory or the District of Columbia, and repealing sections 4386, 4387, 4388, 4389, and 4390 of the United States Revised Statutes. I should like to have the bill read for information.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], who is not in his seat at this moment, objected yesterday to the bill being considered by unanimous consent. I think the Senator from Idaho ought perhaps to see the Senator from New Jersey before taking up the bill for consideration.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to have it read.

Mr. GALLINGER. I observe that the Senator from New Jersey is now present.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. KEAN. Will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. KEAN. I understand that the Senator from Wyoming would like to have the bill read and also to make a brief explanation in regard to it. I have no objection to that course, but of course I do not wish to have it considered at the present time.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be taken up and read. I do not want to displace the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. KEAN. I object to its present consideration, but I have no objection to its being read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill, although considered by unanimous consent, is open to objection under Rule VIII at any time before its passage.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. KEAN. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no railroad, express company, car company, common carrier other than by water, or the receiver, trustee, or lessee of any of them, whose road forms any part of a line of road over which cattle, sheep, swine, or other animals shall be conveyed from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia into or through another State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or the owners or masters of steam, sailing, or other vessels carrying or transporting cattle, sheep, swine, or other animals from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia into or through another State or Territory or the District of Columbia, shall confine the same in cars, boats, or vessels of any description for a period longer than twenty-eight consecutive hours except upon the written request of the owner or person in custody for that particular shipment, when the time of confinement may be extended to thirty-six hours, without unloading the same in a humane manner, into properly equipped pens for rest, water, and feeding, for a period of at least five consecutive hours, unless prevented by storm or by other accidental causes which can not be anticipated or avoided by the exercise of due diligence and foresight. In estimating such confinement, the time consumed in loading and unloading shall not be considered, but the time during which the animals have been confined without such rest or food or water on connecting roads shall be included, it being the intent of this act to prohibit their continuous confinement beyond the period of twenty-eight hours, except upon the contingencies hereinbefore stated: Provided, That in the case of sheep, when the expiration of the time limit occurs at night, they may be allowed to continue in transit until daylight, if by so doing they will reach a place where they can be properly fed, watered, and cared for.

SEC. 2. That animals so unloaded shall be properly fed and watered during such rest either by the owner or person having the custody thereof, or in case of his default in so doing, then by the railroad, express company, car company, common carrier other than by water, or the receiver, trustee, or lessee of any of them, or by the owners or masters of boats or vessels transporting the same, at the reasonable expense of the owner or person in custody thereof, and such railroad, express company, car company, common carrier other than by water, receiver, trustee, or lessee of any of them, owners or masters, shall in such case have a lien upon such animals for food, care, and custody furnished, collectible at their destination in the same manner as the transportation charges are collected, and shall not be liable for any detention of such animals, when such detention is of reasonable duration, to enable compliance with section 1 of this act; but nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the owner or shipper of animals from furnishing food therefor, if he so desires.

SEC. 3. That any railroad, express company, car company, common carrier other than by water, or the receiver, trustee, or lessee of any of them, or the master or owner of any steam, sailing, or other vessel who knowingly and willfully fails to comply with the provisions of the two preceding sections shall for every such failure be liable for and forfeit and pay a penalty of not less than $100 nor more than $500: Provided, That when animals are carried in cars, boats, or other vessels in which they can and do have proper food, water, space, and opportunity to rest the provisions in regard to their being unloaded shall not apply.

SEC. 4. That the penalty created by the preceding section shall be recovered by civil action in the name of the United States in the circuit or district court holden within the district where the violation may have been committed or the person or corporation resides or carries on business; and it shall be the duty of United States attorneys to prosecute all violations of this act reported by the Secretary of Agriculture or which come to their notice or knowledge by other means.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of every railroad, express company, car company, and of every common carrier other than by water, and of the receiver, trustee, or lessee of any of them, wholly or in part engaged in the transportation of live stock by railroad from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia into or through another State or Territory or the District of Columbia, to transport said live stock, so by it or him being transported, with due diligence, and to maintain in all trains containing ten or more cars of live stock which is being transported from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia into or through another State or Territory or the District of Columbia, an average minimum rate of speed of not less than 16 miles per hour from the time any such live stock is loaded upon or into its or his cars, and made part of said train, until such train reaches its destination, or junction point for delivery to another carrier, deducting only in the computation of such average minimum speed such reasonable time as the live stock may be necessarily delayed in unloading to feed, water, and rest, and in feeding, watering, and resting, and in reloading, and such time as the live stock may be delayed by storm or by other accidental causes which can not be anticipated or avoided by the exercise of due diligence and foresight.

SEC. 6. That any railroad, express company, car company, common carrier other than by water, and the receiver, trustee, or lessee of any of them who knowingly and willfully fails to comply with the provisions of section 5 shall for every such failure be liable for and pay a penalty of not less than $100 nor more than $500, which shall be recovered as provided in section 4 of this act.

SEC. 7. That sections 4386, 4387, 4388, 4389, and 4390 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the amendments of the committee may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendments of the committee will be read.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry propose to amend the bill, in section 1, on page 2, line 2, after the word "shipment," by inserting the words "which written request shall be separate and apart from any printed bill of lading or other railroad form;"

On page 2, line 16, after the word "accidental," to insert "or unavoidable;" and

In section 5, page 5, line 11, after the word "accidental," to insert "or unavoidable."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. All the amendments proposed by the committee have been read.

Mr. HOPKINS. I should like to ask the Senator reporting the bill whether the committee of cattlemen and ranchmen were given a hearing before the committee, and if the bill and amendments met their recommendation?

Mr. WARREN. The bill has the recommendation of the live-stock people in conjunction with the Agricultural Department.

Mr. HOPKINS. I know that a few weeks ago there were a number of people here representing large cattle interests and large sheep interests also, and they had hearings before the House committee. I wish to know if the bill is the result of such recommendations as they made to that committee?

Mr. WARREN. This bill seems to represent the consensus of opinion of the live-stock men as expressed at their latest meetings in the West and in the East, and as represented here by a large delegation or committee, which was in consultation with the Agricultural Department and with Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. HOPKINS. Were the amendments of the committee approved by the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. WARREN. I do not think the striking out of the sixteen-hour limit was submitted to the Secretary of Agriculture, because it was not, I think, an amendment proposed by his Department. I understand that the bill as it stands meets the approval of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, without committing myself either for or against the bill, I wish to say to the Senator from Wyoming that complaint has come to me from various quarters, from humane associations and humane people of the country, saying that this bill had always heretofore been considered by the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and that they were watching for the bill to appear there with a view of having a hearing, but in some way it got into the hands of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and they had no opportunity whatever to present their views on the subject. I do not know that it is a matter of great importance, inasmuch as it can be thrashed out in the Senate, but those complaints have come to me from a great variety of people.

Mr. WARREN. I am very glad the Senator from New Hampshire has brought up the point. This bill has never been in the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate. The law which it proposes to amend came from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and every particle of legislation we have on this subject and on the question of live-stock quarantine, etc., regarding live stock, in fact, all legislation regarding matters of live stock, has come from the Agricultural Department and from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, if the Senator will permit me, I recall the fact that on former occasions a proposition has been before the Senate to increase the limit, I think, to forty-eight hours. Am I not correct?

Mr. WARREN. A bill passed the House to extend the limit, I think, to forty hours.

Mr. GALLINGER. Perhaps that is it. Am I not correct in assuming that that bill went to the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate?

Mr. WARREN. Possibly so; but if so, I never heard of it.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator allow me to make a few remarks?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I made the inquiry in justification of the complaints these people have made, not that I am passing upon the propriety of the bill having gone to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will permit one remark, the Senator said that the bill, so far as he knows, had always been before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

I am very certain that such a bill, or a bill changing the time for the shipment of stock without being unloaded, and so on, has been almost always before the Committee on Interstate Commerce. At one time I remember that the former Senator from Texas, Mr. Chilton, reported the bill to the Senate, and afterwards it was referred back because of the opposition to it when it became known to the people that there was such a bill about to pass. So it is not a new subject in that committee. I am not making any question as to where it should come from now, or saying anything on that point.

Mr. WARREN. Notwithstanding that, the proposition still holds good that all legislation we have on the general subject has come from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. CULLOM. The matter to which I referred was a good many years ago. I wish to say that I did not hear all of the bill read, but as I understand it one of the provisions proposes to change the time for the shipment of stock from the West to the East, for instance, from the hours the law fixes now to some other hours.

Mr. WARREN. Only under certain conditions.

Mr. CULLOM. I did not hear the conditions. That is a subject which naturally the people of the country are greatly interested in.

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. And they ought to be heard.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. What is the change of limit in this bill?

Mr. WARREN. It can be thirty-six hours in place of twenty-eight hours in special cases.

Mr. FRYE. I have received a great many letters in relation to this matter.

Mr. SPOONER. Would they not all be special cases?

Mr. WARREN. I do not think the Senator is justified in indulging in that suspicion.

Mr. SPOONER. I asked the question.

Mr. WARREN. I do not think so. I think the extreme provision of the act would be seldom resorted to.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. BURKETT. I have been glancing through the bill, and a point has occurred to me. I should like to ask the Senator what provision has been made to guard against it? If the end of thirty-six hours should come, say, at 10 o'clock at night, during the nighttime, and the stock should be unloaded five hours in the nighttime, that is not any rest. They can not feed. It does not do the stock any particular good, all shippers testify, to be unloaded in the nighttime.

It occurred to me, in talking with some of the stockmen who were here a few weeks ago, that a provision might be made that if the thirty-six hours ended in the nighttime the stock should be unloaded the evening previous, or some provision should be made in the bill to give the stock at least three hours of daylight, on the supposition that cattle and hogs will not eat in the nighttime and will not drink in the nighttime if unloaded in the nighttime. Yet under the bill the thirty-six hours might end at 8 or 9 o'clock in the evening, when they would be unloaded according to the law, and they would rest five hours and be loaded up again; it would be all in the nighttime; and the stock never would have any opportunity to feed or to water.

I have been glancing through the bill to see if any provision has been made along that line. As the Senator can readily see, you could virtually put upon an animal being shipped twice thirty-six hours of practical confinement without feed and water if the end of the thirty-six hours should come in the middle of the night. I should like to ask the Senator if any provision was made to guard against that?

Mr. WARREN. There is no provision of that kind in the law that this seeks to amend.

Mr. BURKETT. I understand that perfectly well.

Mr. WARREN. This proposed law contains a provision as to unloading sheep in the night; cattle can be unloaded in the night; sheep can not.

Mr. BURKETT. Let me ask the Senator if he would object to an amendment being made to provide that at least three hours of the five hours of rest shall be daylight? I think we ought to give the animals some daylight to feed and rest in.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

Mr. LODGE. I merely wanted to ask the Senator from Wyoming whether there have been any general public hearings on this bill?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, there have been no public hearings since the bill was put on the Calendar.

Mr. LODGE. I did not suppose there had been public hearings since the bill was reported.

Mr. WARREN. There were consultations between the committee representing the live-stock people and the humane people, and they continued here for a month. The bill was, as it came into the Senate, satisfactory to the humane societies that were consulted. The objection comes from humane societies farther away, members of which evidently do not understand the intent of the bill.

Mr. LODGE. I do not know, of course, what societies were heard. I only know that certain societies object to the bill. I know that there are societies that are protesting against it and that such protests are coming here every morning.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. That they should not understand the bill is not altogether surprising, for I have utterly failed to understand the provision beginning in line 8, on page 2, which reads:

> Except upon the written request of the owner or person in custody for that particular shipment, which written request shall be separate and apart from any printed bill of lading or other railroad form, when the time of confinement—

I call attention to that statement—

> when the time of confinement may be extended to thirty-six hours, without unloading the same in a humane manner, into properly equipped pens for rest, water, and feeding, for a period of at least five consecutive hours, unless prevented by storm or by other accidental or unavoidable causes which can not be anticipated or avoided by the exercise of due diligence and foresight.

That may be clear to the informed mind, but to the nonexpert mind, like mine, I confess the English seems to be confused.

Mr. WARREN. Perhaps the English is not as clear-cut as the Senator from Massachusetts could suggest. The framers of the bill did not have the advantage of that Senator's knowledge and experience at the time the bill was framed.

Mr. LODGE. I have no doubt it would have helped.

Mr. WARREN. I think it would, undoubtedly.

Mr. LODGE. I have no doubt the stockmen understand it perfectly.

Mr. WARREN. Coming back to line 7, on page 2, it reads:

> For a period longer than twenty-eight consecutive hours * * * unless prevented by storm, etc.—

Twenty-eight consecutive hours—> without unloading the same in a humane manner, etc.

Mr. LODGE. When what shall be unloaded—"swine or other animals," referred to in line 4?

Mr. WARREN. We are not going back to line 4.

Mr. LODGE. What does the word "same" refer to?

Mr. WARREN. To all live stock.

Mr. LODGE. Where is the word "same" referred to?

Mr. WARREN. The matter is open to any suggestion or amendment which the Senator may offer. The objection evidently is not so much to the language of the bill as to the bill itself which is under consideration.

Mr. LODGE. Not at all, Mr. President. I will discuss the bill later, but I do say that it is obvious the bill has been hastily drawn and there have not been public hearings upon it.

Mr. SCOTT. I understand that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] are ready to go on with their arguments on the railroad rate bill, and I object to any further discussion of the pending bill at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator from West Virginia will withhold the objection for a moment, I desire to say that I did not call up the bill without a consultation with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], who is entirely agreeable that its consideration may continue for a certain length of time in order that the subject-matter of the bill may be placed before the Senate. I therefore hope the Senator from West Virginia will withdraw his objection.

Mr. SCOTT. As I understand, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] will object to the consideration of the bill if I do not, and as I wish to discuss this bill when it comes up again, and I am not prepared to do so this morning, I do not see why it is worth while for me to withdraw the objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will lie over.

Mr. HEYBURN. I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection.

Mr. SCOTT. Under the circumstances, I can not do so.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will lie over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. PILES. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 97) authorizing the assignment of pay of teachers and other employees of the Bureau of Education in Alaska.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks for the regular order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Which is the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks for the regular order, which is the consideration of the Calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, since the objection I made to the consideration of the bill in charge of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], I have learned there was an agreement between that Senator and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] that the Senator from Wyoming should make an explanation of the bill before the Senator from Maryland proceeded with his remarks. Consequently I withdraw my objection to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia withdraws his objection to the further consideration of Senate bill 3413, which has been under consideration, but the regular order was demanded by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and the regular order, which is the Calendar, is before the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will withdraw that demand, if I may be permitted to do so under the circumstances.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire withdraws his request for the regular order, and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is recognized.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have only a few words to say. The pending bill is in the interest of the humane treatment of live stock in shipment. The law now on the statute book, and under which we have been shipping stock for some fifteen years or more, has been for most of the time practically a dead letter; but within the last year or two the present Secretary of Agriculture, with that same vigor with which he prosecutes all his business, has undertaken to enforce the law. The strict enforcement of the law has caused great loss and great inconvenience to the shippers of stock and has resulted in the inhumane treatment of stock under shipment. No shipper of stock and no owner of stock desires to injure his animals in shipment, because, if he should do so, it would directly affect his pocket and be to his disadvantage.

This proposed legislation does not extend or lengthen the time except when, under the circumstances, the stock can not be unloaded within twenty-eight hours without loss and damage to it. So the bill provides that, if the owner of stock or his agent should conclude that of the two dilemmas he will take the one of least damage to his stock, and extend the time, he must write an order or a consent to the railroad company requesting that the train proceed to some place of shipment which will not extent beyond thirty-six hours. Indeed, the bill has carefully guarded that point, because it states that such extension of time must be on a written request by the owner or agent, made separate and apart from the bill of lading.

We all know that railroads, in the shipment of stock or other commodities, are liable to put all the privileges due to the railroad in the bill of lading itself, so that when the shipper signs the bill of lading he has signed away all his rights under it.

The railroads provide certain places for unloading and loading stock. While tame stock—pet heifers and family driving horses—can be unloaded at any time and at almost any place off the freight platform as easily as anywhere—and it is that kind of stock that our humane societies and the men who are officers of the humane societies speak and write about—there is no trouble in handling that class of stock. But more than nine-tenths of the stock now shipped over railroads is wild and unused to handling, and the unloading and loading off and on the train of that kind of stock does them more injury than does the entire trip.

In starting out with the intention of unloading at about every twenty-four hours, a shipper intends to get food and rest for his stock at every stop. Under the present law if he meets with delay, if he can not make the point of unloading in twenty-eight hours, he is left high and dry; the stock must be sidetracked or it must be pitched out of the cars onto the prairies or onto the farms, wherever it may be, without chutes or facilities for unloading. Every one knows, who has shipped stock, and every one knows, who has taken notice of the buildings about railroad stations, that it requires facilities in the way of chutes to handle stock. There may be at small points one chute, but that would necessitate taking perhaps ten or twelve hours to unload a full train of stock. But at the regular point where stock is taken off for rest and food they have somewhere from four to twelve chutes each, when they can unload that many cars at a time.

Sometimes in inclement weather the yards are exceedingly muddy, and the unloading may be in the dark where by running along there may be, at the end of twenty-seven or twenty-eight hours, good yards perfectly adequate to provide rest for the stock and for feeding. Thus by extending for a few hours the time of unloading they could reach a much better place for feeding, watering, and rest.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator, as I understand him, says when the stock reaches the watering station or the feeding station it is often necessary to unload them on the platform. I understand the existing law provides that any railroad company—shall confine the same—

That is, the stock—

in cars, boats, or vessels of any description, for a longer period than twenty-eight consecutive hours, without unloading the same for rest, water, and feeding for a period of at least five consecutive hours, unless prevented from so unloading by storm or other accidental causes.

I do not find anything in the existing law by which the railroad company or carrier would be prevented in case of storms or other accidental causes from stopping and unloading at stations which are convenient or going on for two or three hours.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator kindly read that again?

Mr. SPOONER. It is as follows:

No railroad company within the United States whose road forms any part of a line of road over which cattle, sheep, swine, or other animals are conveyed from one State to another, or the owners or masters of steam, sailing, or other vessels carrying or transporting cattle, sheep, swine, or other animals from one State to another, shall confine the same in cars, boats, or vessels of any description for a longer period than twenty-eight consecutive hours without unloading the same for rest, water, and feeding for a period of at least five consecutive hours, unless prevented from so unloading by storm or other accidental causes.

That is the end of that.

Mr. WARREN. The provision in regard to storms or other accidental causes does not cover the ground. Under that the railroad companies would not be permitted to plead the loss of time in running as one of those accidental causes.

Mr. President, I think those who criticise this bill lose sight of the fact that the owners of stock are humane people, and that the owners of live stock are not in the habit of abusing their own property. They are not in the habit of doing that because they love instead of hate their stock, and they feed and take good care of it. They protect their stock, also, because it represents money—it is money in their pockets to protect their dumb animals; but when you have to provide for unloading every twenty-eight hours it often transpires that after seven or eight hours on the road you measure up the time and you find you can not make the next feeding place in twenty-eight hours, and so have to stop and unload the stock when but a few hours out, while you would make perhaps another good feeding station if you could travel on three or four hours longer to where the stock could be unloaded, and still be only perhaps twenty-nine or thirty hours en route. It does seem to me, and it has seemed to the Department of Agriculture for the last year or two, that there ought to be some elasticity in the law. It is not the intention of the bill to extend the time for unloading stock except under circumstances such as make it necessary to do so.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I shall answer a little further the inquiry of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] as to the application of the phrase "accidental causes." The main difficulty in shipping sheep under the provisions of the existing law is that you can neither unload nor feed sheep at night. It is a physical impossibility. If you could drag them out of the car one at a time—which they resist strenuously—they would not eat. Cattle and horses will eat at night, but you can not comply with the law that applies to sheep so far as feeding them at night is concerned. The result is that you have either to keep the sheep in the car until daylight, or perhaps unload them eight or ten or twelve hours under the limitation of the present statute. That is quite a serious matter. Unless Senators have seen the attempt to take sheep out of a car at night they can have no comprehension of the absolute impossibility of accomplishing it. The sheep will not be taken out; they will not be disturbed. If you were to succeed in taking them out one by one by main force it would be useless. They would lie there in the feeding yard, at a loss of ten or twelve or other number of hours' time, according to the time you arrived there. It was the sheep interest that particularly emphasized the necessity of this legislation.

Mr. SPOONER. Then why not confine this bill to sheep?

Mr. HEYBURN. From the standpoint of the sheep men that would be satisfactory; but other stockmen have their reasons. I am free to say that those who came here to present this matter to me, and upon whose request I drew this bill, were sheep men. Idaho is a sheep State; and the application came from that State.

Mr. SPOONER. As the Senator has this bill in charge, I should like to put a question to him.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have not the bill in charge. I only introduced the bill. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has the bill in charge, he having reported it. I would suggest here that it is undoubtedly open to some exception, as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts; in other words, this sentence should be transposed. The exception should be taken out commencing on line 8, page 2, and should be inserted after the word "foresight," on line 18, in order to make a more smoothly constructed sentence; but that can easily be done when we reach a later point in the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. There is one very remarkable change in the legislation, I observe, which the Senator will doubtless be able to explain. Section 4387 of the present law, which was passed in 1873, provides:

SEC. 4387. Animals so unloaded shall be properly fed and watered during such rest by the owner or person having the custody thereof, or in case of his default in so doing, then by the railroad company or owners or masters of boats or vessels transporting the same at the expense of the owner or person in custody thereof.

And, then, the railroad companies are given a lien for the expense of feeding, etc., in performing this duty enjoined upon them by statute in the default of the performance of the duty by the custodian or owner.

Mr. HEYBURN. Section 2 of this bill——

Mr. SPOONER. But section 4388 says:

SEC. 4388. Any company, owner, or custodian of such animals who knowingly and willingly fails to comply with the provisions of the two preceding sections, shall, for every such failure, be liable for and forfeit and pay a penalty of not less than one hundred nor more than five hundred dollars, etc.

I notice this bill altogether omits that penalty as to the owner or custodian, and leaves it only applicable to the carrier. Is that accidental?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that that section was suggested by the legal officer of the Department of Agriculture, who has had the enforcement of this law in charge, because there have been some misunderstandings as to the respective liability of owner and railroad. Sometimes stock is shipped without the owner accompanying it.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course, stock is sometimes shipped without the owner being with it.

The bill provides that the keeping of the cattle in cars longer than twenty-eight hours shall all be subject to the owner upon his request; but they carefully take the owner out of the penalty provision of the statute. The responsibility is taken from the railroad company and put upon the owner when this request is made; but the owner is taken out of the penalty.

Mr. WARREN. At times the cars are only partly filled. There may be only one or two animals in a car shipped to a certain point. It is the cars filled with stock that call for the care of a superintendent.

Mr. ELKINS. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill a question. Is this the same bill which was referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee?

Mr. WARREN. I do not think the bill which the Senator has in hand has been before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate. I sent to the clerk of that committee only yesterday or a day or two ago for the bills that were before that committee, and he reported that there was none before the committee, properly sent there, but that there had been a bill from the House left informally there with the clerk of the committee.

Mr. ELKINS. It seems to me there was an order of the Senate by which a bill similar to this bill, or a bill substantially like it, was referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee, and I would inquire of the Secretary's desk if that is true? The Senator does not know. I thought the bill was before the Interstate Commerce Committee for consideration, and I had it in mind to ask the Senator now in charge of the bill to appear before the committee, when, I thought, we would be governed precisely by his recommendations, and report the bill favorably.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

Mr. LODGE. I have been informed that the protests relating to this bill have all gone to the Interstate Commerce Committee and have never been before the Committee on Agriculture. I should like to be informed whether that is correct.

Mr. WARREN. I have had, I think, all the protests forwarded to me either directly or from other committees or different Senators. I think a good many of the letters have been written by Mr. William O. Stillman, president of the Humane Society. I am in receipt of a telegram, received yesterday, which I will read, and the Senator can conclude what it means; I am not quite sure of it myself. He says:

Senator WARREN,
United States Senate, Washington:
Regret error in statement sent out. Will correct at once.
WM. O. STILLMAN.

Mr. LODGE. I do not know to what that refers.

Mr. GALLINGER. By whom is that signed?

Mr. WARREN. By William O. Stillman.

Mr. KEAN. I have here some protests, Mr. President, made by different people. Here is a protest made by the Humane Society of Lafayette, Ind., and also one from the Humane Society of Muncie, Ind., presented by the Vice-President.

Mr. LODGE. And referred to what committee?

Mr. KEAN. Referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, where they have gone right along.

Mr. WARREN. I will say that I hold in my hand a printed pamphlet signed by Mr. Mortimer Levering, ex-president of the Humane Society of Lafayette, in which he supports this bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

Mr. ALDRICH. I did not understand from the statement made by the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee whether he was speaking for the committee or for himself in saying that this bill would have been reported favorably.

Mr. ELKINS. I said "I thought" it would be so reported.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am very glad the Senator makes a modification.

Mr. ELKINS. If I did not say "I thought so," I went very far. I disclaim that I have polled the committee, but I supposed the committee would report it favorably and I was trying to persuade the Senator in charge of the bill that that would be the case.

Mr. ALDRICH. Experience has shown that the committee is a little uncertain. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELKINS. Not a little, but very uncertain. I will say to the Senator from Rhode Island that I believe if the Senator in charge of the bill had appeared before the committee the committee would have been convinced and would have reported the bill favorably, probably with one modification or amendment.

Mr. WARREN. I thank the Senator for his statement, but I should like to know what the modification is.

Mr. ELKINS. If the bill gets before the committee and the committee interrogates the Senator he will find out. The Senator has had large experience as a cattle grower and shipper, probably the largest in the western country, and I know whatever he might say would go a long way with the committee.

Mr. WARREN. The modification proposed to me by the Senator is embraced in the bill. It is that the time shall be extended only upon the request of the owner or agent in charge of the stock.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. There has been some discussion this morning on this measure, and we have had the subject up for a few moments in the Committee on Interstate Commerce, but I have heard no one as yet who seems to appear for the people who are going to eat these cattle. The humane societies are concerned about cruelty to animals; the shippers are concerned about the expense and trouble of handling their stock; but no one seems to care what is to become of the stomachs of the men and women who are going to eat these animals after they are slaughtered.

Now, it appears to me that that should be the prime consideration, because these stock are in transit for the purposes of slaughter and of being consumed as beef and mutton and pork. The owner does not care. The quicker he can get his stock to the market and dispose of it the better he is satisfied and the less the cost. The railroad does not care at all, so they get the freight. The humane people are off in the moon or somewhere else theorizing about it, but nobody seems to care about the man who is going to eat it. I just want to make the point that animals arriving at their destination in a feverish condition, in an unhealthy condition, by reason of not having had water or anything to eat, are not fit for slaughtering, and that the consideration which ought to obtain here and control in this legislation is that the stock shall reach the market in a perfectly healthy and normal condition, so that when they enter into consumption they shall not entail the danger of disease on those who consume them.

Mr. WARREN. That is exactly what this bill proposes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, does the Senator imagine, after animals have been on the cars, bumped about, and all sorts of things for twenty-eight hours, that you are going to increase their healthfulness by prolonging the time of their retention at the request of the owner, who simply wants to hurry them forward, reduce his expense, dump the stock on somebody who will buy it, and let him sell it? Nobody seems to take any care as to the condition the stock is in.

Mr. WARREN. Did the Senator interrupt me to ask a question?

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, the Senator can answer it in any way he pleases, either as a question or as an argument.

Mr. WARREN. Now I will answer it, because he puts it in the form of a question. The stock shipped under this act will reach the market in better condition and make better food than it will if there be a hard-and-fast rule that at the end of twenty-eight hours, no matter where they are or what are the circumstances, they must be unloaded. The loading and unloading of wild stock hurts them a great deal more than continuing on the road when they are once loaded.

Mr. LODGE. If that is the case, if I may ask the Senator, why not have a thirty-six hour limitation? Then the cattle would be more wholesome and more healthy and in better condition when you get them in.

Mr. WARREN. The world went on very nicely and the stock got to market in very good shape before the law was enacted; but the law is on the statute book.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator what the law was passed for in 1873?

Mr. WARREN. It was passed because the humane society insisted that twenty-eight hours was long enough for stock to be off food and water, and they were right about it; but they did not know then, and very few of them know now, the vicissitudes accompanying the shipment of stock in large numbers over long distances.

I wish to repeat that this bill is a humane measure and is intended to be such. It is asked for by a great many members of humane societies; it is asked for by owners of stock, who certainly will protect their own stock, whatever may be the accusations to the contrary. The railroads are left out of the question. Most of this stock will be unloaded and fed oftener than twenty-eight hours, just the same as before.

Mr. CARTER. May I suggest a reply, which I presume the Senator himself will reach, to the question propounded by the Senator from South Carolina?

The Senator's question implies that the stock will be rushed through for the purpose of avoiding the expense of feeding them at different stations. My understanding is that the desire to abridge unnecessary loading of stock is for the purpose of preventing diminution in weight. The unnecessary loading and unloading of wild stock involves a serious decrease of weight, and it is the weight the owner is desirous of preserving until he reaches the scales where the stock may be sold. The cost of feed at the station and the cost of unloading the stock are trifling items compared with unusual depreciation of weight, which results from the pounding of the stock out of the car and the driving of the stock into the car again at the various stations at which they are unloaded.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have had some letters from humane societies, or humane people, protesting against this bill and inclosing what they said was a strong argument against it, made by members and ex-members, but which proved to be arguments in favor of the bill instead. For instance, the very pamphlet I alluded to a moment ago, which was written by Mr. Mortimer Levering, has been sent me on two or more occasions as a protest against the bill, when, as a matter of fact, it is an argument for the passage of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think I am not mistaken in saying that I have had communications from humane societies saying Mr. Levering is not now connected with the humane society, but is in the employment of cattlemen. I am very sure I have had communications of that kind.

Mr. WARREN. The first is true. The latter is hardly true. He is a partner in a commission firm. And since there has been some discussion about that, I will ask unanimous consent to incorporate in my remarks a part of what he has said, and also a pamphlet issued by the American Stock Growers' Association, the Cattle Raisers' Association of Texas, the National Live Stock Association, the National Wool Growers' Association, and others. It is short; only a few pages.

I should like, also, for the purpose of having the RECORD show what this bill is and so that it may be sent out to those who are interested, to have a portion of the report which contains the memorandum from the Department of Agriculture printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Is the Operation of the Twenty-eight-hour Unloading Law Humane? By Mortimer Levering, for twelve years president of the Lafayette Humane Society.

On the 3d of March, 1873, Congress passed an act to regulate the shipping of live stock, and the same at once became a national law. The exact text of it reads as follows:

"SEC. 4386. No railroad company within the United States whose road forms any part of a line of road over which cattle, sheep, swine, or other animals are conveyed from one State to another, or the owners or masters of steam, sailing, or other vessels carrying or transporting cattle, sheep, swine, or other animals from one State to another, shall confine the same in cars, boats, or vessels of any description for a longer period than twenty-eight consecutive hours without unloading the same for rest, water, and feeding for a period of at least five consecutive hours, unless prevented from unloading by storm or other accidental causes. In estimating such confinement the time during which the animals have been confined without such rest on connecting roads from which they are received shall be included, it being the intent of this section to prohibit their continuous confinement beyond the period of twenty-eight hours, except upon contingencies hereinbefore stated.

"SEC. 4387. Animals so unloaded shall be properly fed and watered during such rest by the owner or person having the custody thereof, or in case of his default in so doing, then by the railroad company or owners, or masters of boats or vessels transporting the same, at the expense of the owner or person in custody thereof; and such company, owners, or masters shall in such case have a lien upon such animals for food, care, and custody furnished, and shall not be liable for any detention of such animals.

"SEC. 4388. Any company, owner, or custodian of such animals who knowingly and willingly fails to comply with the provisions of the two preceding sections shall for every such failure be liable for and forfeit and pay a penalty of not less than one hundred nor more than five hundred dollars. But when animals are carried in cars, boats, or other vessels in which they can and do have proper food, water, space, and opportunity to rest, the provisions in regard to their being unloaded shall not apply.

"SEC. 4389. The penalty created by the preceding section shall be recovered by civil action in the name of the United States in the circuit or district court of the United States holden within the district where the violation may have been committed or the person or corporation resides or carries on its business; and it shall be the duty of all United States marshals, their deputies and subordinates to prosecute all violations which come to their notice or knowledge."

In support of the passage of this law members of the important humane societies throughout the country were zealous and insistent. They had the cooperation of many leading humanitarians. The reasons given at the time for its passage were, in the main, true and of sufficient importance to convince the majority in the House and Senate to vote in favor of the bill.

This law was previously enacted by the legislature of Illinois in 1869, and was framed to meet the transportation conditions of that time, which were even more primitive and barbarous than those of 1873, when it was adopted as the law of the United States.

The exact text of the Illinois law, approved March 31, 1869, reads as follows:

"SEC. 51. No railroad company or other common carrier, in the carrying or transportation of any cattle, sheep, swine, or other animals, shall allow the same to be confined in any car more than twenty-eight consecutive hours (including the time they shall have been upon any other road) without unloading for rest, water, and feeding, for at least five consecutive hours, unless delayed by storm or accident, when they shall be so fed and watered as soon after the expiration of such time as may reasonably be done. When so unloaded they shall be properly fed, watered, and sheltered during such rest by the owner, consignee, or person in custody thereof, and in case of their default, then by the railroad company transporting them, at the expense of said owner, consignee, or person in custody of the same; and such company shall have a lien upon the animals until the same is paid. A violation of this section shall subject the offender to a fine of not less than $3 nor more than $200."

As a matter of fact, the law requiring animals in transit to be unloaded every twenty-eight hours was framed to meet the conditions which existed about forty years ago, and it stands to-day substantially as originally framed. That it is obsolete, unsuited to present conditions, and should be modified are the firm convictions of nearly every intelligent stockman who has no special local or private interest to serve by upholding the law as it stands.

The third of a century last past has shown such wonderful changes in everything relating to the subject that it is difficult to draw a mental comparison and make the contrast of things then and now far enough apart.

It is indisputable that in those pioneer days of live stock transportation shippers encountered greatest difficulties. The science of railways was yet comparatively undeveloped, and much of the country was undeveloped also. The railroad companies were poor, very poor. The building of railroads was hazardous and costly, their equipment meager, limited, and primitive, and the service incompetent. Accommodations for both live stock and people were crude and uncomfortable.

Freight rates on live stock were high, often more than double those of the present time, and charged by carload rate instead of cents per hundred pounds.

Cattle were wild, and so were many of the men who handled them.

Stock cars then were 26 to 28 feet long and 4½ to 6 inches less in width than present cars. They were equipped with hand brakes only, and old rubber springs that soon became hard. A large proportion of them were "combination" grain and stock cars, but little better than tight box cars for live stock, especially in hot weather. They had no equipment whatever for feed and water en route.

Trains were coupled with long links and pins, the great amount of slack causing tremendous impact at every movement during the journey. Old wood-burning engines on the western roads, also equipped with link and pin couplings and handbrakes, slowly dragged along their trains, usually starting them with a jerk and stopping them by reversing steam. The average schedule time, including stops, for freight trains on the five leading western roads in 1873 was 10½ miles per hour, with highest time allowed 12 to 15 miles; and for passenger trains the schedule time, including stops, was 22 to 25 miles per hour, with highest rate of speed allowed 27 to 40 miles.

These trains ran on short, light iron rails, joined by old iron "rail chairs" spiked onto the wooden ties, forming a single-track road, with side switches at each station to permit the passage of trains. The roadbeds were rough and poorly ballasted, with excessive grades, wooden bridges, and trestle work, and everything in a poor state of repair, with many railways in the hands of receivers.

Strong animals evenly matched might stand the journey without any of them being trampled or injured beyond the bruises received during loading and from bumping against the sides of the car en route, provided they were not kept too long under the strain of overloading, for in their crowded condition, with the jerking, jolting, rocking, and bumping of the cars while running, and the rough handling of trains during the frequent switching, it was a constant struggle for them to keep upon their feet.

Contrast the above crude, undeveloped state of transportation thirty-three years ago with the present almost complete construction, equipment, and operation of western railways, now busy and prosperous, with their straight, smooth, double-track roads, loaded with passengers and freight; roadbeds heavily ballasted with stone, and bridges and trestlework of steel, concrete, and stone; laid with heavy steel rails, joined by modern steel angle bars bolted to their sides, thus admitting high speed and smooth running of trains with their heavy loads and equipment; engines, coal or oil burning, heavy and powerful, capable of starting trains without a jerk and stopping them without jolt or jar by the application of air brakes simultaneously to every part, both passenger and freight trains being fully equipped with air brakes and automatic couplings.

Schedule time of both freight and passenger trains is about double that of thirty-three years ago, with practically no limit as to speed allowed.

Stock cars are now generally 36 feet long, 4½ inches wider than a third of a century ago, mounted on highly tempered steel springs, all equipped with train brakes and automatic couplers, and the majority of them are equipped also with conveniences for feed or feed and water en route.

Freight rates on live stock are now equal to about one-half the rates of 1873, and are based on cents per hundred pounds for minimum weight, and any weight in excess of minimum is paid for at the same rate.

As the physical conditions of railways improved and heavy engines running at high speed hauled trains equipped with air brakes and automatic couplers over heavy, well-ballasted, double-track roads with safety, without swaying or jolting, and without the bumping and jerking of frequent switching to allow trains to pass; as stock cars became more roomy, equipped with better springs, and supplied with conveniences for food and water en route; and especially after the installment of the weighing system of ascertaining freight charges on a basis of cents per hundred pounds, which removed the incentive to load beyond minimum weight, it was found that the cattle rode comfortably for long distances, and arrived at market in better condition without unloading en route, except, of course, where the animals were loaded into cars without feed and water equipment and the journey to market required more than two days.

Under the crude conditions of transportation which existed thirty-three to forty years ago and the overloading of cars with live stock then practiced, the "rest" prescribed by the laws of 1869 and 1873 was really needed; now the animals rest while riding. Animals have become more domesticated, tame, and accustomed to small inclosures, stalls, or sheds, while the men who handle them have become more humane and have learned by experience that kindness to animals pays.

The incentives to overloading have been removed, and the protests of packers and other buyers, enforced by rejection or dockage and price lowering on account of bruises and other injuries to the animals and damages to their hides from rough usage, have resulted in a still greater desire to land the live stock at market in the best possible condition.

Under the old transportation conditions shippers on stock trains went out with their prod poles and lanterns at almost every stop to keep their cattle on their feet; now they seldom leave the caboose, except to change cars at the end of the division.

Then hundreds daily of prod poles and lanterns were brought into the commission firms' offices at the end of the journey; now they are never seen.

In 1873 the unloading gangs at market invariably carried ropes for the purpose of dragging the dead and crippled cattle from the cars; now the rope is so seldom used that a special trip has to be made for it on the rare occasions when needed.

In those early days the principal buyers had men stationed regularly at the scales to watch for broken-ribbed cattle, which were frequently found, and $5 per head was deducted from the purchase price of every such steer, buyers sometimes refusing to take them at all. Now they are so rare that we can almost say there are none.

The pens at unloading places, as a rule, are not sheltered, and much of the time they are deep in mud and filth, and it is impossible for animals to lie down in them or obtain any rest whatever while unloaded, and the condition of the pens is often such that to force the cattle or other live stock into them is positively inhuman.

Yet the enforcement of this law requires that stock trains shall be emptied every twenty-eight hours or less, which of course must be done at such points, since the smaller stations en route do not have the necessary capacity nor facilities, compelling horses, cattle, hogs, and sheep to be unloaded in snow, sleet, and rain at all hours of the night and forcing them to remain in exposure and mud for at least five consecutive hours, regardless alike of their suffering and injury, of damages to their owners from delay and depreciation in their value, and of the destruction of railroad schedules, upsetting of all regularity in the handling and running of trains, and greater expense of the service, all of which entails serious and material loss upon both shippers and railways, to no one's benefit. These are facts constantly being demonstrated and susceptible of the fullest proof.

There are three essential features of every law: The passage of it, the construction of it, and the enforcement of it.

A law passed may be a good one, the construction of it unwise, and the enforcement of it unjust.

The law now under consideration, though on the statute book a third of a century, has never been operative or enforced until within a very recent period, while the necessity for imposing its penalties have relatively declined as the time advanced since its adoption. The demand that the authorities give their attention to this obsolete law was not made by the individual shipper or the railroad or the buyer who uses the animals, and these are the three most interested parties. Has it been borne up to the light of legal investigation on the recent wave of reform that is sweeping over our land, or has it been revived by selfish competition or by the tender compassion of needed intervention?

It needs no apprenticeship for the shipper to learn that an animal must arrive at its destination in market in prime condition to command a prime price and in best shape to bring the best price. He being the party financially interested, will also be the most humanely interested. He will demand that his stock is properly cared for, fed, and watered, and if it is not he needs no good Samaritan to suggest redress, nor a friendly lawyer to advise what are his rights, nor any official power to offer relief. He acts independently and at once, and demands damages from the railroad that gives bad treatment to his stock. So it is apparent that many there are who keep the roads mindful of their duty to the animals, the service, and the humble shipper, who generally knows more law about rights against railroads, local and interstate, than most eminent corporation attorneys, and he does not have to dictate his complaint to a typewriter, but he makes it direct, quick, and emphatic to the claim agent, and all others he meets, whether connected with the road or not.

In 1897 the Department of Agriculture sent out a notice to all railroads that complaint had been made that the law regulating time of unloading was not being complied with and advising that the failure to comply with the provisions of the law would render them liable to the penalties provided in section 4388.

Immediately following this notice, the Texas Cattle Growers' Association held a meeting in San Antonio and protested against the enforcement of the law, and the following year, 1898, the National Live Stock Exchange, a federation of all the live-stock exchanges in the United States, adopted resolutions setting forth convincing arguments why the twenty-eight-hour law was not humane, but to the contrary, and asked that Congress be petitioned to extend the time to forty hours instead of twenty-eight. A few pertinent reasons expressed in those resolutions are these:

"That it is found from actual experience that consequences incident to the law enforcement are in direct violation and contradiction of the humane measures for which it was framed, and that the twenty-eight-hour section operates more in the direction of cruelty to animals than it does to overcome and prevent inhumanity.

"That inhumanity to cattle is necessarily followed by immediate depression in value, both as affects their general appearance and loss in weight upon arriving at market.

"That the prevalent theory that owners would permit their cattle to suffer famine and water for the purpose of a stuffing process by the way of a 'fill' at the market destination is entirely inconsistent with the experience of good judgment and common sense."

It too frequently occurs that when people are aroused they express sympathy with what to them seems a needful betterment of conditions or amelioration of suffering, without having first traveled the route or taken advice from those whose experience entitles their statements to credence and serious consideration.

The shippers of cattle, sheep, and hogs and the commission men who receive them and put them on the market are a unit that the twenty-eight-hour law is unwise, unjust, inhuman, and impracticable. There are hundreds of men whose opinions are the very highest authority, who confirm this statement, and they have a high regard for everything that promotes kindness to all stock and prevents harshness, neglect, or cruelty to animals. It is no kindness to unload hogs en route; they are comfortably provided for. If the distance is great and the weather hot, the hogs are put in long stock cars, well ventilated and bedded with wet, cool sand; feed and water is provided for them in the cars. If they are unloaded, in nearly every instance several hogs die from exposure in the unsheltered railroad yards.

When cattle are unloaded they are usually put in muddy yards, do not have shelter over them, and they come into market very much depreciated. At these small country unloading places the chutes are usually steep, and the cattle are forced to go out and into the cars again, and are many times bruised, which is always a loss to the stockman.

* * * * * * *

An ordinary case in point may be cited, having occurred within the past few days: A train of cattle was loaded in western Iowa and billed for Chicago. They started Wednesday evening, to arrive in Chicago Friday morning, to be sold upon arrival. As they could not be delivered at destination in less than thirty-four hours (which was only six hours in excess of the law), they were unloaded in twenty-six hours, or Thursday evening. After resting five hours they could not arrive in time for Friday's market, and there being no market Saturday, they had to be kept in the pens until Sunday evening, and arrived Monday morning for market. The pens in which they had to stay were very filthy, being deep in manure and mud, as it rained nearly every day. The cattle were discounted at least 50 cents per hundred pounds in the price, and their loss in weight was very large. The loss in such a case would be nearly $200 per car, and amounted to all the profit the feeder might have for his season's feeding.

Reasons for not compelling the unloading of live stock in shipment every twenty-eight hours. It is just and fair. It is more humane. It saves injury. It saves loss. Issued by American Stock Growers' Association; Cattle Raisers' Association, of Texas; National Live Stock Association, and others.

Reasons for amending Article 4386, Revised Statutes of the United States, which now requires that live stock shipped by rail shall be unloaded at the end of twenty-eight hours.

The proposition herein discussed is to extend the time to thirty-six hours, exclusive of the time for loading and unloading.

THE ORIGIN OF THE TWENTY-EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

When the section of the statute in question was adopted as a law of the United States, on March 3, 1873, there was comparatively little shipment by rail of live stock for long distances, and practically no shipments of range stock. The vast areas of public lands and railroad grants west of the Missouri River were not occupied by cattle ranches, sheep ranches, and stock farms, and were not penetrated by railroads equipped for carrying live stock. The conditions surrounding the matter of transporting live stock were entirely different to what they are at this time. Furthermore the twenty-eight-hour limitation was purely an arbitrary one, probably arrived at after a comparatively slight inquiry, and it has been said, and likely is proven, that the occasion for the enactment of the statute in question was due to the activity and energy of the private-car lines, patenting and preparing to put into use specially equipped stock cars for the purpose of feeding and watering the live stock en route, which they wished to compel the public to use. This is evidenced to some extent by the provision of section 4388, as follows:

"But when animals are carried in cars, boats, or other vehicles in which they can and do have proper feed, water, space, and opportunity to rest, this provision in regard to being unloaded shall not apply."

UNIVERSAL DEMAND OF STOCKMEN FOR EXTENSION TO AT LEAST THIRTY-SIX HOURS.

The American Stock Growers' Association and Cattle Raisers' Association of Texas, representing those mainly engaged in the cattle business throughout the great Southwest; the National Live Stock Association, representing numerous organizations of persons in the sheep business, cattle business, and other lines of live-stock business; the various State live-stock organizations; the National Wool Growers' Association, and the National Live Stock Exchange, representing live-stock commission merchants of the United States, all demand the extension of the time to at least thirty-six hours. Most of these bodies have passed resolutions expressive of this demand.

During the Fifty-seventh Congress a bill fixing the limit at forty hours was passed by the House. It went to the Senate and was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. A subcommittee was appointed to which it was referred; but the bill was never reported and died a natural death.

The opposition to extending the time by the Humane Society is due to misapprehension, for—

It is positively less humane to comply with the twenty-eight-hour limit than it would be to extend the time to thirty-six hours, as herein requested.

It compels the doing of positive injury in many instances, does practically no good in any.

EXPERIENCE DEMONSTRATES THE INJURIOUS RESULTS FROM ENFORCING THE TWENTY-EIGHT-HOUR LIMIT—THE SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE INDORSES THE PROPOSITION TO EXTEND THE TIME.

During the years 1904 and 1905 the Secretary of Agriculture undertook the enforcement of this law. During that time actual experience demonstrated in hundreds of instances the great hardship and injury to the animals caused by the enforcement of this law by requiring them to be arbitrarily unloaded at the end of twenty-eight hours, against the judgment of shippers who were present and could see what was best to do.

It often resulted that live stock would have to be unloaded when suitable or sufficient pens were reached, earlier than the twenty-eight hours, because no sufficient pens for the quantity of stock en route could be reached within that time—the railroads choosing the safe side to avoid the penalty.

It frequently resulted in unloading the live stock 50 or 100 miles out from the market, when the market could have been reached by an hour or a few hours more than the twenty-eight hours. It resulted in upsetting all calculations with respect to the time of reaching the market. It often resulted in concentrating so many live stock at particular pens en route that the yards were insufficient for the extraordinary number of live stock which the law arbitrarily required to be unloaded at such point. It compelled the cattle to be unloaded in storms, in snow, sleet, and rain, at all hours of the night. It upset the handling and running of trains, requiring them to be split up, and some of the cars having been loaded earlier would have to stop, while others would go on, and all of this entailed serious and material loss upon the shipper to no one's benefit. This can be thoroughly demonstrated by hundreds of instances.

The Secretary of Agriculture, after a thorough investigation of the matter, reached the conclusion that the live-stock shipper was entitled to relief from this twenty-eight-hour limit, and he therefore concurs in the effort to secure an amendment of the law to that end.

With all of these indorsements and representations upon the subject, it would seem a little remarkable that there should be any question with respect to this amendment of the law.

As the country has developed by the construction of railroads and the rail transportation of live stock, the establishment of markets, feeding places, points of reshipment through the growth of this vast commerce, it has been plainly seen that this law should not apply to existing conditions and that has been fully evidenced by the fact that for twenty years it has practically been a dead letter, unenforced until recently, as above stated. This argues strongly that there was no general demand for the enforcement of such a law and no apparent necessity for its enforcement; in other words, the business and the proper handling of the business in its evolution has entirely outgrown this antiquated if ever beneficial law.

And now that practically everybody who is affected by it demands an amendment as herein requested, Congress would certainly fall far short of its duty if it fails to do so.

THE DEMAND IS ONLY REASONABLE AND FAIR.

It may be said that the demand for the extension of this time is largely from the shippers from the West, but this is not wholly true, for the experience in shipping from Chicago, Kansas City, and St. Louis to points in the East like Pittsburg, Buffalo, and Boston, and to various localities for feeding and fattening purposes in the States of Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, and others when the twenty-eight-hour law was rigorously enforced, developed as material hardships in that class of shipment as in shipments from the West to the Missouri River markets or to Chicago. Shippers and others interested in that sort of shipments are earnestly demanding the change in the time limit to thirty-six hours.

If, however, the principal complaints and demands have come from the West, it is because of the fact that it is a stock country and from that territory the long rail shipments are the rule or the necessity, both for the benefit of the shipper and the benefit of the consumer, and it is to be expected that those who are materially affected by the rigor of the arbitrary and unreasonable statute are the ones who complain about it and demand its amendment or repeal; those who are not affected naturally are not complaining. It argues nothing, therefore, against such amendment that the demand is greater from the West and none from States not much affected. The duty to protect the interests which need protection is none the less because there are localities and conditions where it is not much needed.

* * * * * * *

Since these cattle are going to the market for the purpose of being killed, manifestly it is better to get them there at as early a time as possible for that purpose. They are taken off the range, they are wild cattle, they are nervous, they are in strange surroundings, and the result is that there is a material shrinkage, which, as every stockman knows, can not take place except as a result of suffering, more or less. This shrinkage will mean, in a shipment which is taken off under the circumstances above named, on a 1,000-pound animal, about 1 pound for every hour, or an equivalent of 25 pounds practically for the loss of a day, and at 4 cents per pound is $1 per head and on twenty-five head is $25 for a car. An extra feed bill is incurred of $3 per car, and there is a loss of time of the attendant and extra expense that will amount to from 50 cents to $1 per car. On being killed it is shown that they have been bruised upon their ribs and hips, and occasionally a hip will be knocked down and a rib broken and occasionally a horn will be knocked off.

It is capable of actual proof, and there is no doubt about it, that this results from the unloading and reloading.

These cattle don't go into the car at command and take their places in the cars like a person. They must be forced out and forced in, and it is impossible to conduct the business in any other way. As a result they jam each other at the car doors and at the chutes, both in unloading and reloading, and there is necessarily a consequent injury. While the cattle are in the cars there is little opportunity, if the cars are loaded sufficiently full, for them to hook or gore each other. Their heads are generally up and they have little physical opportunity to do it, but when they are unloaded into the pens they begin "milling" around, lowing and hooking, scarring and goring each other. This is a condition with respect to range cattle that is so well known that every stock man avoids as much as possible the detention of cattle in pens. The amount of injury and damage from all these causes that will be done to such a shipment of these cattle unloaded at end of twenty-eight hours instead of going on more than offsets any advantage gained by such unloading. Now, this can be substantiated almost, if not quite, unanimously by all experienced men.

SHEEP AND HOGS SHOULD RARELY BE UNLOADED.

We have never heard of an argument made to show the wisdom of unloading sheep and hogs. Sheep can not be handled in the night, and the process of loading and unloading is slow. They naturally stand crowding and will rest as well in a car as out. They do without water indefinitely without suffering, and the shipper is the best judge as to how they should be handled. It is probably far better that the law should not require sheep to be unloaded in less than forty-eight hours.

As to hogs, the general opinion is that, except for some special reason or circumstance, they are better off not to unload them. Hogs lie down during shipment, making a bed in the sand or straw in the car, and there is little excretion. In hot weather they are sprinkled in the cars; in the cooler weather they need no water. Corn can be and is put in the car for feed. So they have all of the comforts which a hog can get, and there is not any reason for any law making a time limit on hogs.

The shipment of horses and mules forms so inconsiderable portion of the traffic that little has been said about it, but it can be safely stated that the shipper knows better how to handle them in each shipment than Congress can provide by general rules.

The reason for unloading is said to be for rest, feed, and water. There are several points which ought to be considered in this connection to which attention will be directed.

(1) Four-legged animals may rest and sleep on foot as well as by lying down.

(2) Range cattle will not, as a rule, rest in pens any more than in cars, if as much. They are dissatisfied, nervous, and restless.

(3) Gentle fed cattle may, and often do, lie down in transit when they become sufficiently tired, but in neither case is rest required like it is with a person.

(4) Animals get their place in the car and become contented.

(5) Animals in transit brought from the ranges, as shown by experience, eat little and drink little—oftentimes not at all. It is the nature of the animal to store food and drink, which is quite different to human beings, and it is a demonstrable fact that in the range country, ordinarily, an animal will stay away from water and oftentimes not drink more than once in two days, and in cooler weather often a longer time.

(6) Their nervous and agitated condition in shipment prevents them from having much desire for food and drink. That produces no suffering apart from the mere matter of inconvenience of carriage, and nobody has ever been able to demonstrate and can not demonstrate that animals will be suffering from want of water and food in a thirty-six-hour run. Sometimes they may, and sometimes they may not.

(7) Hogs and sheep, in the judgment of shippers, do not need unloading within the thirty-six hours. Forty or fifty hours would be a better rule for them, or rather leave it with the judgment of the shipper.

THE BEST AND MOST HUMANE TREATMENT CAN BE OBTAINED BY LEAVING TO THE SHIPPERS TO JUDGE FROM CIRCUMSTANCES.

Every man undertakes to run his business in the most profitable way, and that is human nature, and as experience grows intelligence increases, and the time has come when every stock shipper of the country knows that the better treatment that he gives his live stock the better will be their condition on arrival at the market, and their condition at the market reflects precisely the treatment they have received en route. He knows that the experienced buyer can tell at a glance the treatment the live stock has received. He knows that extra unloading and reloading means a loss to him if the cattle are injured, and the greater the injury the greater the loss. The result is that he uses all of the care consistent with doing the business at all, in the loading of his cattle and in the unloading of them. He knows their appearance has a great deal to do with their value and his desire is to keep them in the best appearance. He does not want a droopy, tired, and worn-out animal on the market, so he will unload them when necessary and possible. It is subject to absolute demonstration that the experienced shipper can tell from the circumstances as he views them whether the cattle should be unloaded or not en route to market or elsewhere. He must weigh these circumstances with a view to the best possible treatment of his cattle. He may reach a point where he intended to unload and rest his cattle, feed, and water them, but on reaching there may find that there is a snow storm or rain storm and that he is required to expose his cattle and injure them far more than the feed and rest will do them good, so he passes judgment upon the situation and directs that they shall go on, because he knows it best to do so. At other times cattle reach the pens and find them full of other cattle and it will require that his cattle remain standing in the cars on a side track for from two to five or six hours in order to be unloaded at all, and he may thus find it best for the cattle to go and make a longer run than he had intended rather than to unload. Should the law prevent him doing so?

We assert it as a principle that it is beyond peradventure that a shipper can better judge whether the live stock ought to be unloaded from the circumstances as they present themselves than Congress or anyone else can judge in advance, and that his best interest is to give his cattle the best possible treatment.

But it may be said that notwithstanding most men are careful and conduct their business on lines of humanity and to their own interest, yet some will be careless and will permit their cattle to stay a long time on cars if left to their discretion, and that they will be permitted to suffer, and that the law is intended to reach that class of persons. But it must not be overlooked that while reaching an apparently few of that class it will produce injury to the man who conducts his business carefully. The experience and judgment is that little injury will ever result from extending this time to thirty-six hours, when serious injury will result from enforcing the twenty-eight-hour law.

If the few will commit acts of inhumanity, let them be prosecuted for their acts or neglect, but do not on that account compel others to do infinitely greater inhumanity, and also incur great loss in their business as judiciously conducted.

THE RAILROADS ARE NOT GIVEN RIGHT TO MAKE SLOWER TIME.

But it may be said that the railroads will simply make use of the additional time; that they will run slower, and at last the extension of time will do the shipper no good. Of course, no law can be passed that may not occasionally be made use of for ulterior ends. It may be in some instances that might so happen, but the common law requires that the railroads use due diligence in the transportation of live stock. It has been a source of complaint that they have been compelled to pay a great many damage claims for delay, and the inducement for diligent service which is brought about by their liability for delay is a sufficient guaranty that they will not undertake to take advantage of this extension of time, for the matter will be in the hands of the shipper to require a performance of their duty as the law requires or to answer to him in damages, so he has it within his power to thus compel the performance of that duty. When the twenty-eight-hour law was not in force, simply laid dormant upon the statute books from a practical standpoint, these runs, which have been heretofore described, between principal market places and points of reshipment, were customarily made in thirty or thirty-one hours, and the railroads did not then take advantage of it as affording any excuse for slow running, neither was the twenty-eight-hour law made use of to fix the liability of the railroad for delay; it is based on the common-law requirement of diligence. The extension of the time to thirty-six hours will not affect in any way the liability of the railroads for negligent delay.

Furthermore, during the time that the twenty-eight-hour law was being enforced the railroads gave no better speed and service than they did when it was not being enforced, if as good. If they are disposed to take advantage of the law then by slow running, they are always compelled to unload, and in that case are not liable for a penalty. When you have reached a convenient place for unloading at any point on its line, if in the judgment of the railroad it will take longer than twenty-eight hours to reach the next point, what happens? Your live stock is unloaded arbitrarily without your consent, contrary to your judgment, and can't help yourself. This is exactly what has been found by experience.

It is all a mistake to suppose that the enforcement of the twenty-eight-hour law will secure better service. That law requires no speed schedule or that any distance shall be covered in that time. If the law required a speed schedule, it would not likely require an average of over 20 miles per hour between division points, and must except accidents, storms, and floods, so that if the time be not extended an unloading would generally be required in shipments for distances of 500 or 600 miles unless the time is extended.

For these reasons, in the name of justice, fairness, and humanity, let the time limit be extended.

[Report to accompany S. 3413.]

The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, which has had under consideration the bill (S. 3413) to prevent cruelty to animals while in transit by railroad or other means of transportation from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia into or through another State or Territory or the District of Columbia, and repealing sections 4386, 4387, 4388, 4389, and 4390 of the United States Revised Statutes, reports the same back to the Senate favorably and recommends that the bill do pass as amended.

The bill seeks to provide:

1. A more humane way of handling all kinds of live stock during periods of transportation.

2. Better control to the shipper, and, through more humane and orderly shipment, a decrease of loss or damage on the live stock in transit.

3. Aid to the railroads, through greater elasticity (based upon the wish of the owner) in handling live stock more humanely and promptly, and to deliver it at its destination with less friction and delay.

A strict application of the present law (which was for many years almost a dead letter) inflicts great hardship upon the dumb brutes in transit, great inconvenience and loss upon the owners, and unnecessary delay and consequent loss upon the carrier.

The law is mandatory that twenty-eight hours shall be the limit of confinement in car, whereas in many cases twenty-nine of thirty hours would land the stock into market with no unloading and reloading from point of shipment to destination. To always break the trip at twenty-eight hours or any earlier time and take the stock out of the cars and into yards and then put them back into the cars again causes very much greater hardship and punishment to the stock than if it were taken through directly to destination, provided the entire time does not exceed the thirty-six hours proposed as the maximum, under some circumstances, in this measure.

Again: The twenty-eight hours might expire in the early part of the night, while cars were distant from any proper chutes or yards for unloading, and to leave the stock standing in the cars on a side track is as bad, and perhaps worse, than to move along until daylight to some place for unloading.

Chutes and yards for live stock are installed only at certain stations, and for obvious reasons can only be properly installed at certain stations, leaving long distances between, where, if cars are delayed, stock must remain unloaded. If it is a large shipment of stock, it is practically useless to unload it at some small yard where there is but one chute, intended for the loading and unloading of single or few animals, or, at the most, a car at a time. A large shipment of several cars of stock should be unloaded at yards where there are from two to a dozen chutes and sufficient yards to permit the unloading and reloading of a whole train without long delay, and without exciting, bruising, and therefore greatly injuring the stock.

In the case of shipments of sheep, it is practically impossible to unload them in the night, and the consequence is, if no place can be reached in daylight the shipment must proceed either until daylight or far enough to reach some proper unloading place, and there wait for daylight, before they can be unloaded.

To those who know the habits of sheep it is unnecessary to more than state this fact: To unload them in the night is to drag them out one at a time and tie each one or confine it to prevent its returning to its fellows in the car. On the other hand, sheep drink but little and can go longer without food and water than can cattle.

It is an extreme hardship to apply the twenty-eight-hour law to all cases and under all circumstances.

If the shipment of live stock is judged from the standpoint of a city or village man who sees only the domesticated, well-broken animals in the habit of being handled as individuals or in small numbers, the hardship of the law as at present would not seem severe. But the great proportion of live stock shipped by railroad is from the plains and pastures where the animals have not been handled and domesticated, but are wild and nervous, and in loading for shipment, even if they are quietly handled, considerable suffering and loss must occur. And after the stock has covered a part of its journey, it becomes more nervous and excited, and the unloading and reloading brings about still greater suffering and loss. Unloading them into muddy yards—and the yards are often in bad condition—gives them little rest and less food, and oftentimes they refuse to drink the impure water afforded in the unclean yards.

A strict compliance with the present law has developed some legal technicalities and shortcomings, which are referred to in the memorandum prepared by the Department of Agriculture, which follows. * * *

The following is a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture transmitting a memorandum prepared jointly by the legal adviser of his Department and the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry; and the views expressed therein have the indorsement of your committee:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., February 12, 1906.

DEAR SENATOR HANSBROUGH: I transmit herewith a memorandum on the subject of Senate bill No. 3413, relative to the confinement of live stock while in transit by railroad or other means of transportation, which has been prepared at your request by Doctor Melvin and Mr. McCabe.

Very truly, yours,

JAMES WILSON,
Secretary.

Hon. H. C. HANSBROUGH,
Acting Chairman Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

[Memorandum.]

It is suggested that the bill be amended by inserting in line 7 of section 1, after the word "shipment," the words "which written request shall be separate and apart from any printed bill of lading or other railroad form." It is thought that this amendment is necessary from the fact that without it it will be possible for the request to be incorporated in the printed form and signed by the shipper pro forma.

The statute commonly referred to as the twenty-eight-hour law was enacted by the Forty-third Congress and became a law by the approval of President Grant on March 3, 1873. It now forms sections 4386–4390 of the United States Revised Statutes. It prohibits the confinement in cars, boats, or other vessels for a longer period than twenty-eight consecutive hours of cattle, sheep, swine, or other animals which are being conveyed from one State to another without unloading the same for rest, water, and feeding for a period of at least five consecutive hours, unless prevented by storm or other accidental cause. The penalty for violation of the statute is from $100 to $500. The provision for unloading does not apply when animals are carried in cars, boats, or other vessels in which they can and do have proper food, water, space, and opportunity to rest. The present bill proposes to repeal sections 4386–4390 of the United States Revised Statutes and to enact similar legislation, with some few amendments and changes, as follows:

1. The statute is broadened to cover practically every common carrier of live stock, including receivers of any such carriers. The Supreme Court has held in the case of United States v. Harris (177 U. S., 305) that the present law does not include the receiver of a railroad company. A short time ago a certain railroad in the hands of a Federal receiver was confining animals fifty and even sixty hours without rest, food, or water, and the receiver could not be reached under the present law.

2. The transportation of live stock from a State to a Territory, from a Territory to a State, or from or into the District of Columbia, is covered by this bill. The United States court of the district of Kansas has held recently, in the case of the United States v. The St. Louis and San Francisco Railroad Company (an unreported case), that the present law does not cover a shipment from a Territory to a State, the wording of the statute being "* * * which transports live stock from one State to another."

3. In the present bill it is proposed that the time during which animals may be confined by the carrier without food, rest, or water shall remain at twenty-eight hours, the time provided in the present law, with the exception that upon the written request of the owner or person in custody of the shipment the time may be extended to thirty-six hours. It frequently happens that the twenty-eight hour limit has expired when the shipment was within a few hours of the destination, and if the law is made sufficiently elastic to enable the shipper to control this matter it is thought that less suffering will result to live stock in transit. It is the opinion of the best informed owners and shippers of live stock that when live stock can be carried to market within thirty-six hours it is better and more humane to allow them to go through without unloading than to unload at the end of twenty-eight hours.

Based upon careful observation of the workings of the law, the treatment of the live stock to the advantage of the shippers and owners thereof, it is the opinion of the Department of Agriculture that if certain other amendments to the present law, which are incorporated in the bill now in discussion, shall be adopted, the time during which live stock may be confined in cars without food, rest, or water may be extended from twenty-eight hours to thirty-six hours without disadvantage to the live stock. The great western markets are Chicago, East St. Louis, and the Missouri River towns. The ranges and feed lots are so located that if the railroads give the shippers anything like reasonable service, with a thirty-six-hour limit, by far the larger proportion of live stock can be transported to market within thirty-six hours, and this will obviate the necessity for unloading the greater part of the stock. With a thirty-six-hour limit it will not be necessary to unload live stock from any locality more than twice.

4. This bill provides that live stock must be loaded and unloaded in a humane manner and into properly equipped pens. This is a serious omission in the present law. Cases have been reported to the Department of Agriculture, and confirmed by that Department, where live stock has been unloaded in a brutal manner and into pens in which the mud was 2 feet deep and the facilities for feeding and watering, to say nothing of resting, were entirely inadequate. Under the present law the Department of Agriculture could not correct these conditions.

5. This bill provides that the time consumed in loading and unloading shall not be counted in computing the time during which live stock may be confined in transit. This simply amounts to incorporating into the law the practice which has prevailed in the enforcement of the present law.

6. It is provided in this bill that in the case of sheep, when the expiration of the time limit occurs at night, they may be allowed to continue in transit until daylight, if by so doing they will reach a place where they can be properly fed, watered, and cared for. The unloading of sheep at night, even under the most favorable conditions with electric-lighted yards and trained goats, is a difficult process. It frequently happens that the time limit expires during the night at a point where these facilities are not available, and it is then utterly impracticable to unload sheep.

7. In section 2 of the bill there is an immaterial change from the wording of the present law regarding the collection of the feeding charges.

8. It is also provided in section 2 of this bill that the shipper shall have the right to furnish the necessary food for his stock in transit if he so desires. The present law gives a lien on the stock for food furnished by the carrier, and it has happened that many companies have charged exorbitant fees for supplying food, and the owners and shippers of stock in many cases have been outrageously overcharged.

9. In section 3—a penalty section—in this bill the word "willfully" is used where the word "willingly" occurs in the corresponding section of the present law. It should be stated in this connection that the original act, as it passed Congress and was approved by the President, contained the word "willfully," but through an error while incorporating into the Revised Statutes it became changed to "willingly."

10. Section 3 of the present bill—a penalty section—is changed by exempting the owner or shipper of the live stock from the penalty for failure to unload for food, rest, and water. The present law, as construed by the Federal courts, imposes liability for this failure equally upon the shipper and the carrier. The shipper surrenders control of the live stock in a large measure to the carrier, and he is unable to unload the stock without the active cooperation of the carrier. Inasmuch as the carrier is assured payment for food furnished, it is thought the primary liability for failure to unload should be laid upon the carrier.

11. In section 4 of the present bill it is provided that United States attorneys shall prosecute all violations of the act reported by the Secretary of Agriculture, or which come to their notice or knowledge by other means. The measure relates entirely to animal industry, which, in all other respects, is under the control of the Department of Agriculture, and the inspectors of the Bureau of Animal Industry, from their location and the character of their work, are well situated to secure the enforcement of the law.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does not the Senator think it wise to have the bill reprinted with the pending amendment, so that when we send it out people will understand what the bill proposes?

Mr. WARREN. I thank the Senator for the suggestion, and I will ask that the bill be reprinted with the pending amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Before that is done I wish to say a word. I have been trying to understand that clause, but not being a live-stock man I am very stupid about it. But, after all, this proposed law has to be adapted for all persons as well as live-stock men.

Mr. WARREN. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that he confer with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] and then offer an amendment now.

Mr. LODGE. I am going to see if I have got out of it what it means. As it now reads——

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator tell us what line and page?

Mr. LODGE. I am reading from page 2, and the point I am coming to first is in regard to line 12—

When the time of confinement may be extended to thirty-six hours, without unloading the same in a humane manner.

As that stands, it might mean that if you unload them in an inhumane manner, the time need not be extended. It is perfectly blind writing.

Mr. WARREN. But, taken in connection with line 8, it is all right. I admit that the language is not happy.

Mr. LODGE. I dare say, to the expert mind it is absolutely good English, but I am speaking for the common, ordinary lay mind which wants to understand the law.

Mr. WARREN. The bill seems to have put the Senator from Massachusetts in an inquiring frame of mind.

Mr. LODGE. It has. I think the whole bill suggests inquiry.

Mr. WARREN. All bills do to those who oppose them.

Mr. LODGE. I do not know that I am opposed to this bill. If it is going to make the treatment of cattle more humane to extend the time when they shall be kept without food and water from twenty-eight hours to thirty-six hours, I am in favor of the bill. I want to see cattle humanely treated. I want them brought to market in the best possible condition. If it will bring them to market in better condition and if it will cause less suffering to the animals to keep them without food and water for thirty-six hours instead of twenty-eight hours, and I can be convinced of that, I shall cheerfully vote for the bill.

Mr. WARREN. Now, along on that line, I renew my suggestion that the Senator from Massachusetts give us the benefit of his experience and confer with the Senator from Idaho who introduced the bill, and the amendment may be offered.

Mr. LODGE. I only want to see if I have got the sense of the passage. Suppose it should be made to read in this way, beginning with line 8: Strike out the word "except" and make it read:

Provided, That upon the written request of the owner or person in custody—

Strike out the word "for" and insert "of"—

of that particular shipment, which written request shall be separate and apart from any printed bill of lading or other railroad form, the time of confinement may be extended to thirty-six hours, without unloading said cattle, sheep, swine, and other animals, and such unloading, when made, shall be conducted in a humane manner, and the said animals shall when unloaded be placed in properly equipped pens for rest, water, and feeding.

Is that the meaning of the passage?

Mr. WARREN. That language would be entirely satisfactory.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that as this bill came to me it was satisfactory to the humane society, the railroads, and the shippers. They had a conference, and it was so represented to me, and I introduced it.

Mr. LODGE. My suggestions are not intended to defeat the passage of the bill. I am merely suggesting a rewording of it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will say to the Senator that I have noted an amendment, and intended, upon opportunity offering, to move to transpose those sentences. I think they should be transposed. After the word "hours," in line 8, I would strike out down to and including the word "hours," in line 13, and then it would read:

Shall confine the same in cars, boats, or vessels of any description for a period longer than twenty-eight consecutive hours without unloading the same in a humane manner into properly equipped pens for rest, water, and feeding for a period of at least five consecutive hours, unless prevented by storm or by other accidental or unavoidable causes which can not be anticipated or avoided by the exercise of due diligence and foresight.

Mr. LODGE. That is a repetition of the present law.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Provided, That upon the written request of the owner or person in custody of the particular shipment the time of confinement may be extended to thirty-six hours.

Mr. LODGE. That is entirely intelligible.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have my personal copy of the bill annotated, with a view to offering the amendment at the proper time.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will have the bill reprinted in that way, then we will get an intelligible bill. I think that is a good preliminary for discussion.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, it is evident that this bill can not be disposed of now, and therefore I ask the Senator from Idaho to suspend, in order that the Senator from Maryland may commence his speech on the rate bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will do so at once.

Mr. WARREN. An arrangement has been effected with the Senator from Maryland, who is ready to proceed, but the point was to have the bill reprinted——

Mr. NELSON. All right.

Mr. WARREN. And in its reprint contain the amendment proposed, and then give the floor to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will offer the amendment which I have just stated. I will put it in form and send it to the Clerk's desk to be printed under the agreement that the bill shall be reprinted with the amendment. I have nothing more to offer at this time.

The bill as proposed to be amended by Mr. HEYBURN was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no railroad, express company, car company, common carrier other than by water, or the receiver, trustee, or lessee of any of them, whose road forms any part of a line of road over which cattle, sheep, swine, or other animals shall be conveyed from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia into or through another State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or the owners or masters of steam, sailing, or other vessels carrying or transporting cattle, sheep, swine, or other animals from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia into or through another State or Territory or the District of Columbia, shall confine the same in cars, boats, or vessels of any description for a period longer than twenty-eight consecutive hours, without unloading the same in a humane manner, into properly equipped pens for rest, water, and feeding, for a period of at least five consecutive hours, unless prevented by storm or by other accidental or unavoidable causes which can not be anticipated or avoided by the exercise of due diligence and foresight: Provided, That upon the written request of the owner or person in custody of that particular shipment, which written request shall be separate and apart from any printed bill of lading or other railroad form, the time of confinement may be extended to thirty-six hours. In estimating such confinement, the time consumed in loading and unloading shall not be considered, but the time during which the animals have been confined without such rest or food or water on connecting roads shall be included, it being the intent of this act to prohibit their continuous confinement beyond the period of twenty-eight hours, except upon the contingencies hereinbefore stated: Provided, That it shall not be required that sheep be unloaded in the nighttime, but where the time expires in the nighttime in case of sheep the same may continue in transit to a suitable place for unloading, subject to the aforesaid limitation of thirty-six hours.

SEC. 2. That animals so unloaded shall be properly fed and watered during such rest either by the owner or person having the custody thereof, or in case of his default in so doing, then by the railroad, express company, car company, common carrier other than by water, or the receiver, trustee, or lessee of any of them, or by the owners or masters of boats or vessels transporting the same, at the reasonable expense of the owner or person in custody thereof, and such railroad, express company, car company, common carrier other than by water, receiver, trustee, or lessee of any of them, owners or masters, shall in such case have a lien upon such animals for food, care, and custody furnished, collectible at their destination in the same manner as the transportation charges are collected, and shall not be liable for any detention of such animals, when such detention is of reasonable duration, to enable compliance with section 1 of this act; but nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the owner or shipper of animals from furnishing food therefor, if he so desires.

SEC. 3. That any railroad, express company, car company, common carrier other than by water, or the receiver, trustee, or lessee of any of them, or the master or owner of any steam, sailing, or other vessel who knowingly and willfully fails to comply with the provisions of the two preceding sections shall for every such failure be liable for and forfeit and pay a penalty of not less than one hundred nor more than five hundred dollars: Provided, That when animals are carried in cars, boats, or other vessels in which they can and do have proper food, water, space, and opportunity to rest the provisions in regard to their being unloaded shall not apply.

SEC. 4. That the penalty created by the preceding section shall be recovered by civil action in the name of the United States in the circuit or district court holden within the district where the violation may have been committed or the person or corporation resides or carries on business; and it shall be the duty of United States attorneys to prosecute all violations of this act reported by the Secretary of Agriculture, or which come to their notice or knowledge by other means.

SEC. 5. That sections 4386, 4387, 4388, 4389, and 4390 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. KEAN. Let the bill go to the Calendar under Rule IX.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho proposes an amendment to the bill. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the bill with the pending amendment be reprinted. Is there objection?

Mr. LODGE. Do I understand that it is to be printed with the change of language suggested by the Senator from Idaho?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is the understanding.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will formulate and send it up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming? The Chair hears none.

Mr. KEAN. Now let the bill go to the Calendar under Rule IX.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go to the Calendar under Rule IX.

Mr. WARREN. Do I understand that the bill goes over under Rule IX?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Then I wish to say that I shall move at the first favorable opportunity, after the bill has been reprinted, to take it up for further consideration.

ESTATE OF HAROLD BROWN, DECEASED.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

The bill (S. 3401) for the relief of the executors of the estate of Harold Brown, deceased, was announced as the first business in order on the Calendar, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay to the executors of the estate of Harold Brown, late a citizen of Newport, R. I., $861.75, being an excess of taxes improperly levied and collected on legacies and distributive shares of the personal property of the estate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. TILLMAN. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of the unfinished business, being the rate bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAYNER obtained the floor.

Mr. PILES. Will the Senator from Maryland yield to me for a moment that I may call up a joint resolution?

Mr. RAYNER. I yield.

BUREAU OF EDUCATION EMPLOYEES IN ALASKA.

Mr. PILES. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 97) authorizing assignment of pay of teachers and other employees of the Bureau of Education in Alaska.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to permit teachers and other employees of the United States Bureau of Education employed in Alaska to make assignments of their pay; and the Secretary of the Interior is further authorized to reimburse school-teachers in Alaska for expenses incurred by them in the discharge of their duties and paid from their personal funds.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the concluding sentence of the joint resolution be read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

And the Secretary of the Interior is further authorized, in his discretion, under such regulations as he may prescribe, to reimburse school-teachers in Alaska for expenses incurred by them in the discharge of their duties and paid from their personal funds.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that is all right. As I caught the reading of the joint resolution there did not seem to be any provision whereby these expenses should be certified; but I presume that the Secretary of the Interior under the joint resolution will attend to that.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I believe we all realize that the subject now under consideration is one of supreme importance. If I were asked to define at the present moment and under existing conditions which one of the powers of Congress under the Constitution was of the greatest interest to the country I would immediately select the power to regulate commerce among the several States. Randolph said that it was this clause, the right to regulate commerce among the States, that gave us the Constitution, and that if Congress under the Confederation had possessed the power to impose an ad valorem tax of 10 per cent upon foreign importations there never would have been a Constitution for the United States. The issue before us was bound to come; it is not an artificial controversy, and I am delighted to know that it is not a party question. It is exhilarating to feel that a momentous subject of this sort is above and beyond the lines of party strife, and that we can now tear away for a temporary period from our traditions, and, obliterating the lines that divide us on this floor, unite in the performance of a duty that we owe to our countrymen who are looking to us for relief and for an equitable adjustment of their rights.

I propose in the brief argument that I shall address to the Senate to resort to the process of elimination and attempt, if I can, to bring to the front the actual issues now before us. I shall be very well satisfied if I can accomplish this. If we are to generalize and bring in all the subjects involved in this controversy the inquiry would be interminable, and instead of order and precision, chaos and confusion would rule supreme.

What we want to know is the exact nature of the evil that calls for remedial legislation. The literature upon this matter has simply been appalling. The examination of witnesses has proceeded to the point of exhaustion. A whole battalion of experts have volunteered suggestions upon topics that have no bearing upon the points involved. College professors have submitted plans for running railroads, and political economists and psychologists have issued instructions to traffic managers as to the proper classification of merchandise and the transportation of freight, and every shipper and consigner who has had a grievance against the railroads or the Interstate Commerce Commission or the courts has been extended a hospitable invitation to appear and narrate the methods through which he would immediately remedy the prevailing abuses.

If you add to this that almost the entire press of the country has taken up the controversy, that magazines have been filled with dissertations upon it, and that hundreds of commercial organizations have petitioned Congress upon its various phases, we can then form some idea of the magnitude of the investigation that has taken place. The committees have done their work well and deserve the commendation of the country for the faithful performance of their arduous duties. Now that their labors are completed, it is for us to extract from this tangled mass of contradictory statements and conflicting views the real and genuine essence from which the agitation springs, so that we can grasp the vital points at issue and intelligently consider and impartially determine the contest submitted to our arbitrament.

THE COMPLAINTS AGAINST THE RAILROADS.

When the complaints against the railroads began and found expression at the various conventions that were called to consider them, they covered a very wide field, but with the progress of Congressional investigations they have narrowed and are now confined within a limited compass. The original grounds of complaint can be easily classified under four descriptive headings:

First, the subject of rebates;

Second, the subject of unreasonable rates;

Third, the subject of discrimination between localities, individuals, and commodities; and,

Fourth, the subject of private cars and sidetrack terminal facilities.

The fourth subject may be included in the third.

REBATES.

In regard to the first grievance upon the subject of rebates it is sufficient to say that its present discussion has become impracticable to a large extent, because the custom of allowing what are known as rebates and concessions to shippers from published rates no longer prevails to such an extent as to cause us any uneasiness, and because the law known as the Elkins Act furnishes the necessary and efficient means to correct these abuses if they should occur to any extent in the future. It is refreshing to observe that upon this subject the people and the railroads appear to be in entire unison. Mr. Walter D. Hines is among the most intelligent and decidedly among the best informed and most instructive witnesses who have addressed the committee upon this branch of the subject. Mr. Hines is now counsel of the Atlantic Coast Line. In 1901, when the Interstate Commerce Commission, in its fifteenth annual report, referred to the widespread prevalence of secret rebates, Mr. Hines was assisting in supervising the traffic department of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad. He was also vice-president of the road and its assistant chief attorney.

I take for granted, as a matter of course, that during all this time when this widespread prevalence of secret rebates was in vogue Mr. Hines never permitted his road for a moment to indulge in this abhorrent practice, and never sanctioned the slightest violation of the law in this regard. I also take it for granted that Mr. Hines, like all other eminent counsel of trunk-line railroads, feels the deepest solicitude for the public welfare, and is at all times anxious to gratify the public whenever its rights come in conflict with the demands of his constituents.

In therefore dismissing the subject of rebates, I do so with an admonition that we all heed the warning that so eminent an authority as Mr. Hines has given us upon this subject, which reads as follows:

It should be borne in mind that the motive on the part of the shipper to secure rebates is a continuing motive, and a very powerful one, and the fact that they are temporarily stopped is no proof that they will be permanently stopped. It is, therefore, necessary in any revision of the law to insure the most persistent and continuing supervision of that branch of regulation, in order to make sure that that portion of the shipping public which strives to get rebates and those carriers which are willing to yield to such pressure will not be encouraged by any apparent laxity on the part of the executive power, which is supposed to enforce the law.

UNREASONABLE RATES.

This brings me to the second proposition, Are rates unreasonable? If unreasonable rates were the only ground of the present complaint, governed by the preponderance of testimony I would be compelled to hold that the general charge had not been sustained. The best informed witnesses upon the part of the people have declared that there is no general ground for complaint throughout the country on account of the unreasonableness of rates.

Mr. Kernan, one of the most intelligent witnesses upon this subject, has testified as follows:

You will find in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred—

That is strong language, coming from Mr. Kernan, one of the principal witnesses for the people and against the railroads—that the complaint before the Commissioners has not been that the rates are too high. It is all a question of the relation of the rates to be established.

* * * * * * *

That is the question, and that is why you have got to have a commission and why it has to have power.

Governor Cummins, of Iowa, has given the following testimony:

While I believe that the railroads are making quite as much if not a little more than they ought to make in view of the capital that they have invested in their enterprises, yet if that were the only question, I do not believe there would have been any demand for additional legislation. The objection entertained by those with whom I am associated is that the railways undertake to develop this country according to their views of the way it should be developed.

Notwithstanding these admissions, that there is no general dissatisfaction throughout the country with existing rates, there is still a considerable amount of complaint in certain sections and among particular interests that rates have been unduly raised. The claim is made, controverted by the railroads, that within the last few years there has been a large increase in railroad revenue, and that a large number of classifications have been unduly changed. In the official classification which governs class rates in the territory north of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi it is charged that a large number of advances have been made in ratings over previous classifications. In the last report of the Interstate Commerce Commission to this body it is stated that 500 advances were made in the southern classification and over 250 in the western classification. Not only this, but witnesses before the committee, of standing and character, have testified to unreasonable advances in particular lines of industry and business. Rates upon live stock from almost every point in Texas have been advanced since 1898 upon an average of nearly $20 per car, and they are higher to-day than they have been at any time since rates were filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. Cowan, representing the Cattle Raisers' Association of Texas, has testified as follows:

It is a fact that rates from most points in Texas have been advanced since 1898 an average of $17.50 to $20 per car, and they are to-day higher than they have been at any time since rates were filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission. * * * These advances have likewise applied to the Indian Territory, Oklahoma, New Mexico, Arizona, and from most points in eastern Colorado, western Nebraska, and western Kansas, parts of Wyoming and South Dakota, though the advances in the rates have not been as great from all points in such States as in the State of Texas.

Not only have the live-stock rates been advanced, but in March, 1903, an advance of from 7 to 20 per cent was made on practically all class goods and commodities, with a few exceptions, from points on the Mississippi River and east thereof to the State of Texas.

We have further testimony before the committee that the fruit interests of California, one of the largest and most important interests in the country, in the suit against the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe and the Southern Pacific railroads, claimed that unreasonable rates were charged on fruit from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic seaboard. The lumber interests of the South have complained that an advance of 2 cents a hundred pounds is unreasonable and have petitioned the Interstate Commerce Board for redress. Mr. Robinson, representing the New Orleans Board of Trade, in addressing the committee, has made upon this subject the following emphatic declaration:

We claim, and we believe, and we are sincere about it, that the railroads are getting an unjust share for transporting our manufactured products and our agricultural products. Since I have been here I have heard with a great deal of surprise from the traffic managers that rates have been reduced. Well, people generally do not understand it that way. If you go to the manufacturer of lumber in the several States and tell him that his rate has been reduced when he knows that every day he is paying $8 more per ton than he did six years ago you would have a very hard time to convince him that rates have been lowered. You would have a difficult time making him see that.

Mr. Clements, Interstate Commerce Commissioner, has submitted the following evidence in connection with the subject of unreasonable rates:

There were 65 roads in that great territory all operating under the official classification promulgated by the committee of fifteen.

Now, in the latter days of 1899 this committee got together and formulated what they called "Classification No. 20," which was to take effect January 1, 1900, from that territory, making a new classification for the following year. They worked over it for days, and I do not know how long amongst themselves, and when they published it it contained in it between six and seven hundred changes in rates, which would not be changing the rate from 25 cents to 30 or 40 cents by name, but by taking one or a dozen articles out of classification No. 6 and putting it into class No. 5, and out of class No. 5 into class No. 4, because the rates applied according to the number of classifications. It took sugar out of one class and put it into a higher one, thereby increasing the rate on sugar on all that territory and between all the stations in that territory. It took soap in carloads and less than carloads—and what moves more freely than soap and sugar—to every station in America. And when you put a little infinitesimal increase in freight rates on all that is carried in carloads or less than carloads over a great extent of territory like that, it means a great amount of revenue. The same was true, I say, with between 600 and 800 articles. These things were lifted up from one class to another by that committee and promulgated to take effect within ten days.

In the last report of the Interstate Commerce Commission the following statement appears in reference to unreasonable rates:

One of the most significant things in recent railway operations is the steady advance in the cost of the transportation of freight by rail. A few years ago the impression was general that freight rates could not and would not be advanced. Railway traffic officials frequently affirmed this in testimony. When the Commission had under consideration certain consolidations of railway property, the eminent gentlemen who had brought them about stated under oath that the purpose was not to advance but rather to reduce rates. Recent history belies these predictions. This increase in the transportation charge has been accomplished in various ways.

First. The published rate itself has been advanced. Class rates have not, as a rule, been advanced, although in some cases they have been, as for example, from St. Louis and kindred points to the Southwest, where such rates are higher to-day than they were when first filed with the Commission in 1887; but rates upon those commodities which constitute the bulk of interstate traffic have been advanced in nearly all sections. Coal rates have, almost without exception, been increased. The same is true of iron schedules. Rates upon grain and its products, lumber, live stock and its products are generally higher to-day than four years ago.

Second. Many advances have been brought about by changes in classification. While, as already noted, class rates as a whole have remained the same, many commodities have been advanced from a lower to a higher class, this producing an increase in the transportation charge.

Third. Many commodities which formerly took a special commodity rate have been restored to the classified list. This has worked an advance, since the commodity rate is usually lower than the class rate. In the same line there has been a constant disposition to withdraw special privileges which had been accorded, and to charge for services which had been rendered free.

I have only referred to these instances, a few among a much greater number, to show that the subject of unreasonable rates is by no means an obsolete one. It must be observed that there is not a moment of time that it does not lie within the power of any combination of railroads to impose unreasonable rates upon any shipper whom they serve, or upon any commodity that they carry. It is sufficient for me now to say that whenever an unreasonable rate exists at present, and whenever an unreasonable rate may be imposed in the future, we are, as I shall hope presently to demonstrate, without any practical or legal remedy to rectify the abuses.

Before leaving this branch of the subject there is one other observation that it is my duty to make. It has been frequently stated during the hearings that the unreasonableness of rates is entirely immaterial to the shippers, provided that the rates are relatively just and nondiscriminative as among them. I will not consent to this proposition for a moment. I will not accept it so far as the consumers of the country are concerned, because the lower the rate the lower the prices of consumption. I reject it so far as the shipper is concerned, because the lower the prices of consumption the greater the demand and the greater the increase and the profits of his business. The people of the United States, who have not been represented at these hearings because it is impossible to organize them, are deeply interested in the maintenance of reasonable rates, and they look to us to protect them, and on behalf of the unrepresented beneficiaries of the trust I claim it is our duty to enact such legislation as shall always insure them against any extortion that they may be at any time subjected to.

Mr. WARREN. Will it disturb the Senator from Maryland if I ask him a question?

Mr. RAYNER. Not at all, if I can answer it.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator has spoken about the effect of the Elkins law being to stop rebates. I should like his opinion whether freight rates have been reduced by the railroads because of the stoppage of rebates, or whether it has merely put that much more money in the coffers of the railroad companies by compelling all shippers to pay the high rates?

Mr. RAYNER. I am not prepared to say that rates have been reduced, and I am not prepared to answer the general proposition whether it has put more money into the hands of the railroad companies. But I am prepared to say that even if rates have not been reduced, even if it has put more money into the hands of the railroad companies, it is a perfectly proper provision of the Elkins bill that rebates shall be stopped.

Mr. WARREN. I agree with the Senator, but I wanted his idea as to the effect upon rates.

Mr. RAYNER. I do not think it has reduced rates. I am not prepared to say that stopping rebates has reduced rates. That is a nonessential point in the argument I propose to address to the Senate.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to ask the Senator from Wyoming if, as suggested in his inquiry of the Senator from Maryland, it should appear that stopping rebates put more money in the pockets of railroads, would he restore the practice of granting rebates?

Mr. WARREN. If I may have the privilege of answering, I will say, no; but let it go under a proper name as a law to benefit railroads as well as shippers, and not masquerade under the misrepresentation that the law is a thrust at the railroads and to protect the people at the railroad's expense; let us admit that the law protects the railroads equally as well as the shippers. Indeed, I think better.

Mr. RAYNER. Now, Mr. President, I have given my opinion, and very briefly, about the subject of rebates and the subject of unreasonable rates and that leaves only one grievance to complain of. Having passed the outposts, let us go to the fortifications, where the controversy rages and where this Hepburn bill is, in my judgment, absolutely inefficient to remedy it, if remedy can be applied.

The issue, Mr. President, to anyone who has examined the testimony in the House and the Senate is discrimination. If an accurate discrimination railroad map of the United States were published to-day, there is hardly a sane man in the country who would believe it honestly represented the situation. It would be regarded as the product and the hallucination of a disordered intellect.

I am not coming to the remedy now, and I am not prepared to say that we can apply any remedy for it, certainly not upon one branch of it—the question of differentials—to which I shall presently come. It is a difficult subject to deal with.

We know, for instance, Mr. President, that the rates on a number of lines of merchandise from Chicago to Denver, taking those as an illustration, are three times as large as the rates on the same merchandise from New York to San Francisco. We know that it costs less to ship goods from New England to the Gulf than it does to ship them from Chicago to the same terminals, although the distance is seven or eight hundred miles greater. We know that it costs more to ship goods one-third of the distance across the continent than it does the whole of the distance, and that when goods are destined from Boston, for instance, to Salt Lake City they are carried to San Francisco and back again to Salt Lake City in order to obtain the cheap rate. We know that we can multiply in an overwhelming degree instance after instance in which the country is disfigured by these discrepancies, where the less the distance the greater the cost and the greater the distance the less the cost.

Now, let us see whether we can not approach this discussion with an agreement that we ought to provide some tribunal. I do not care whether it is the Commission or the court, we ought to provide some tribunal with some adequate power to adjust these proportions and remedy these discordant figures above and beyond the railroads, who are merely building up their own territory to increase their own revenues and enlarge their own profits.

Before I go into a detailed discussion of the remedy let us see what is the trouble. I want to be conservative in what I say. I am in favor of a bill that is honest to the railroads and honest to the people. I do not propose, however, that railroad counsel shall frame a bill and ask me to support it. I do not propose, on the other hand, that public clamor shall drive me to the support of a radical or revolutionary measure. I do not believe in public clamor. Public opinion even can not decide this issue for us. Public opinion changes its mind too quickly. It condemns to-day what it applauds to-morrow. It reverses its own verdict with cynical composure, and those whom to-day it mounts upon the crest of its favor to-morrow it buries under the torrent of its disapproval. The President of the United States is a striking illustration of the transition of public opinion from one extreme to another. To-day it sends forth its anathemas of hate and to-morrow it builds its monuments of love.

Every great reform in history, Mr. President, has been born amid the haunts of the minority upon the ruins of public opinion. Public opinion can not decide this issue for us. It is in our hands, as the counsel of the people against the experts of the opposition. The railroads have summoned to their rescue the genius of the American bar, and in some way or another there has been incorporated into this bill a provision which absolutely destroys it and makes it ineffective for the purposes for which it is designed. Let me state our position here. Of course I have no right to speak for our side at all. When I say "our position" I mean my position, with perhaps some conclusions which may be changed that have been reached in conference among a few of us.

My position here is, in the first place, that you must put into the bill a court that can try the constitutional question. You have a bill without a court. We might as well be frank about this business. As a matter of law and as a matter of right—I may be wrong and, of course, I only advance my suggestions for what they are worth—you have a bill which, when attacked by counsel for the railroads, will be declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States, because it gives no court in which the railroad or the shipper can obtain a judicial review of the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Assuming that I am wrong and that it does give you a court by indirection, providing the venue in which the suit may be brought, but failing utterly to give a court of competent jurisdiction to try the suits when they are brought.

You have a bill with suspending orders that absolutely nullify the order of the Commission. Let me address my argument here to the other side, because I believe that we stand largely in favor of doing away with the suspending orders, or modifying them, at least, to such an extent that they shall not have the effect that is stated in the bill.

What are these suspending orders? Let me give you a case. We will take the rate between Chicago and New York. Let us take a practical case, because that is the best way to illustrate it. Let us take the rate between Chicago and New York, of a dollar on first-class merchandise. You go before the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Interstate Commerce Commission lowers that rate to 75 cents. The next morning, or the same afternoon, the carrier appears—assuming now that the courts have jurisdiction—in the circuit court of the United States and files a bill to suspend that order, and the order is gone. Then, when the circuit court of the United States decides the case against the carrier it goes to the circuit court of appeals, and asks the circuit court of appeals to suspend the order of the circuit court, and the suspension is given, and that order is gone. Then, when it loses its case in the circuit court of appeals it goes to the Supreme Court of the United States. That has been done, because I have the case right in front of me in which that very thing was done. It goes to the Supreme Court of the United States and asks the Supreme Court of the United States to suspend the order of the circuit court of appeals, and there the order is gone. How long will it take? Can it do that in less than three years? If it can not, the three years are gone, because the order of the Commission does not live but three years, according to my construction of the proviso, and all during those three years, by suspending orders, you have your challenged rate in existence, and then the very next day the old rate comes into existence again.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. RAYNER. I do, with pleasure.

Mr. DOLLIVER. What the Senator says would be true if the court vacated the order. Suppose the court affirmed the order of the Commission?

Mr. RAYNER. Yes; but I am speaking of a case where it reverses the order of the Commission. I am taking the case where the order of the Commission is reversed.

Mr. DOLLIVER. The three years, I call the attention of the Senator, apply to the period of time during which the carrier is in obedience to the order.

Mr. RAYNER. I think the Senator from Iowa is entirely mistaken about this proposition. My construction differs from his upon the three years' limitation.

Now, I am not admitting that there is a court of competent jurisdiction. I do not believe it for a moment. I do not believe this bill gives any court at all, but I am assuming that it does. If the bill does not give a court it is simply void under the Minnesota decision, but I am assuming that the bill does give a court. I think the Senator from Iowa, however, believes that the bill gives a court. The Senator believes that under this bill there is a court in which the question of judicial review can be tried?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. RAYNER. I have not any doubt about it the other way. Assuming that I am wrong, I want to take your claim and assume that you are right. You will have some difficulty in proving that, because I have not met a single member of my profession on this floor, on either side, who does not agree with me that the bill is absolutely void because it gives no court. It gives a constitutional right. The constitutional right exists, but it gives no court. It is true you have a constitutional right, but the Constitution does not create inferior courts of the United States. The inferior courts of the United States are, every one of them, Congressional courts. I do not know any court except the Supreme Court that is organized by the Constitution of the United States.

You go to work and frame a bill with the constitutional right. in the case I shall presently read, the Supreme Court has stated there is no inferior court to try the constitutional right in.

Mr. DOLLIVER. While it is true that the bill does not create a court, it is not true that Congress has not heretofore created a court, because if the Senator will consult the act of March 3, 1887, amending the act of March 3, 1875, which amended the original judiciary act, he will find that the act of March 3, 1875, as amended by the act of March 3, 1887, and corrected by the act of August 13, 1888, reads as follows:

> That the circuit courts of the United States shall have original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several States, of all suits of a civil nature, at common law or in equity, where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of interests and costs, the sum or value of $2,000, and arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority, or in which controversy the United States are plaintiffs or petitioners.

Mr. RAYNER. Read that a little louder about the second sentence. The Senator read the rest of it loud enough. It is the second sentence that does the harm.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

Mr. RAYNER. One minute. Let me finish. You can not get into the circuit courts of the United States or in any court of inferior jurisdiction under the judiciary act if the amount of $2,000 is not involved.

Mr. DOLLIVER. As far as I am concerned, I do not desire to allow these great corporations to go into a court of the United States making a false and humbug charge that their property is being confiscated, if only $2,000 is involved.

Mr. RAYNER. But you do not propose to allow the shipper to go into court either, unless there is $2,000 involved.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I do not think the shipper will make any claim to get into court. I regard this talk about the appeal of shippers in these cases as mere dust in the air.

Mr. RAYNER. Of course, the Senator from Iowa will realize that I am upon the general character of the bill altogether with him, notwithstanding his argument; but the Senator will find that under the judiciary act you must show that $2,000 is involved in the suit.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Let me say to the Senator here is a great corporation going into the court claiming that its property is being confiscated. What difficulty would there be in that litigant placing himself in the attitude of other litigants and asserting that $2,000 was involved?

Mr. RAYNER. Assertion does not answer the purpose. We might as well, I will say to the Senator from Iowa, discuss the fundamental propositions of law here. You can assert that $2,000 is involved, but if in the trial of the case it does not appear that $2,000 is involved, then there is no jurisdiction.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Then the case ought to be dismissed in equity without any hearing at all.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Would a tariff law covering a large schedule levying a tariff tax on a vast variety of subjects be void unless it contained a provision that it could be questioned in some court of the United States?

Mr. RAYNER. I am now speaking of the way the shipper or the carrier go into court and complain that a rate made by the Commission is unconstitutional.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

Mr. RAYNER. One moment. On the complaint that the rate is unreasonable the court decides in favor of the shipper. The carrier can not get into court unless the controversy embraces $2,000. I have tried a case myself of this character. I went into the circuit court and I had to allege in the bill and prove it that the amount involved was $2,000. The inferior courts of the United States have no jurisdiction except the jurisdiction conferred by the judiciary act, and the judiciary act provides that the suit must involve $2,000. There are hundreds of cases before the Interstate Commerce Commission. I understand there were two or three thousand cases before it informally cited where the amount involved was not $2,000. Let me state what you ought to do in this bill, even if I am wrong. Let us agree upon this, because the Senator from Iowa and myself agree upon the main bill. I am with him in the point he wants to reach. Let us put courts in this bill beyond all question, so that there will be no ambiguity. The first point the railroad counsel will raise in the Supreme Court is under the Minnesota case, that this statute does not give them judicial review, and it is a very doubtful question to say the least. We can remedy it by just putting a line in the bill giving the inferior courts jurisdiction. I want to read——

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I ask the Senator if he contends that in suits in equity the two-thousand-dollar limitation requires that the issue shall be a money demand in that sum? For instance, take the Minnesota case to which the Senator refers, where the question was on the rate fixed on milk cans, a short haul; I have forgotten what it was. A suit in equity was brought and entertained because of the injury that would result. How much freight money was immediately involved there?

Mr. RAYNER. That was under the fourteenth amendment.

Mr. FULTON. The railroad company goes into court and contends that the rate fixed by the Commission is confiscatory. Does the Senator contend that it must be shown that a freight item in itself amounting to $2,000 is involved before the court can hear the case?

Mr. RAYNER. I should like to know whether the Senator takes a different view, or whether any other lawyer here on this floor takes a different view. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] whether he does not agree with me upon this propsition? He and I have conferred, and I know his opinion. I sit over upon that side, and I know a number of gentlemen over there are trying to convert me to the principles of the Republican party. When I first came here I did not know how to vote upon certain bills, and I always waited to find how the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senators from Connecticut voted, and then I always voted the other way; but if they voted different ways, then I generally turned to them and asked, How is the President on this question? [Laughter.]

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. RAYNER. I do, with pleasure.

Mr. FORAKER. As I understand the Senator from Maryland, he contends that this bill is absolutely unconstitutional because it lacks the proper provision for a court of review, and I also understood him to say that that was written in there by some railroad lawyer. I want to ask him who the railroad lawyer is?

Mr. RAYNER. Well, the Senator is not the railroad lawyer. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORAKER. I want to know whether it is the Senator from Iowa, or who it may be.

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator from Iowa is not a railroad lawyer.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not suppose he is.

Mr. RAYNER. Of course I did not mean that as a criticism. The railroad lawyers are faithful to their clients, as they have a perfect right to be; but I did not say that of this clause. I said it of the suspending clause.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

Mr RAYNER. I was speaking of the suspending clause. I said the clause giving the courts the right was written in by a railroad lawyer. They are the best in the land, and I know they are. It is not necessary for me to mention them. I have a list in my possession giving the names, and I will show it to the Senator after the Senate adjourns to-day. He knows them very intimately, too, and so do I. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORAKER. This is extremely interesting, and it is very humorous, too. This is the first time I have heard that the railroad lawyers had anything to do with the making of this bill. I have been suspecting it all the time.

Mr. RAYNER. I did not know that the Senator was in this primeval condition of innocence.

Mr. FORAKER. I am, but I have been suspecting it, and I hope the Senator will give us the benefit of the names.

Mr. RAYNER. The railroad lawyers might have had but little to do with the bill, but you can rely upon one thing, they placed in a word wherever they could. That one word "suspension" is the word they want. The Senator from Ohio knows it. You leave that word "suspension" in the bill and I would like to vote against the bill and prefer to pass no legislation at all. I am coming to that.

Let us stop now one moment upon the constitutional question.

Mr. FULTON. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. As I understand the Senator's contention, it is that the bill is unconstitutional because it does not provide any court to which parties aggrieved may appeal. Now, he says that the Minnesota case went into court under the fourteenth amendment. I ask him, assuming that he is right, if ordinarily a right of review should be provided for in order to allow a party to go into court if his constitutional rights are not infringed? I ask him if, where a party's constitutional rights are infringed, he contends that it is necessary to provide for review, and if he does not, if there is any obligation on the legislative power to give a review where a party's constitutional rights are not infringed? Is it not a mere matter of grace whether legislation will extend the right to review where the constitutional rights are not infringed?

Mr. RAYNER. I had better answer that from the decisions. I did not intend to do it, because I took it for granted the point that gave us difficulty was whether this bill gives a court. That is the first difficulty. Does it really give a court? By giving a venue, does it give a court? I never knew that any one had the slightest doubt on earth about the proposition that you must give an inferior Federal court jurisdiction to try a constitutional question; and not merely that because the Constitution says that taking property without due process of law or unjust compensation is unconstitutional you can go into any court in the United States when the legislation does not give a court. Let me read the case. I think that will settle it, although I am willing to leave it to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] and to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX].

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. RAYNER. I want to read this case, and then it may be the Senator will not ask me any question about it.

Mr. DOLLIVER. No; I want the matter to which the Senator referred before. It appears to me from what the Senator from Ohio said that I am entitled to say a word.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. RAYNER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I have become very familiar with the charge that the railroad lawyers are at the bottom of this bill. I think I ought to say that, so far as the frame and mechanism of the bill are concerned, the framers of it did take counsel of a great lawyer, the Attorney-General of the United States, and that there is not a line in this portion of the bill which can not be completely defended by anybody familiar with the judicial practice of the United States.

Mr. RAYNER. Well, the Senator is creating a little disturbance about nothing. I never pretended to say it was drawn after consultation with railroad lawyers. But it is easy enough to do a thing in an indirect way—to make suggestions. That word "suspended" has either been used unintentionally or it has been used under some advice with a perfectly honest intention. Do not misunderstand me. No one could think better than I of those who were engaged in the consideration of the bill in committee. Do not understand me as criticising the committee. The Senator from Iowa will not place me in such a position. I do not think any man is willing to stand up here for the railroads against the rights of the people. I do not believe it. I do not believe there is a single Senator on this floor who would stand here when the rights of the railroads come in conflict with the rights of the people to advocate the rights of the railroads.

Now, let me give you the cases. There will be a good deal more to be said here. I do not want to quote cases, but I want to give the lawyers of the Senate a leading case on the subject. Of course many of them know it. It is the case of Sheldon et al. against Sill, in 8 Howard, page 448. That case has been affirmed in a case in 18 Wallace and again reaffirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in 147 United States Reports. Now, let me just read a few lines and see if there is any doubt about this proposition:

That "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish." The second section of the same article enumerates the cases and controversies of which the judicial power shall have cognizance, and, among others, it specifies "controversies between citizens of different States."

* * * * * * *

Congress may withhold from any court of its creation jurisdiction of any of the enumerated controversies. Courts created by statute can have no jurisdiction but such as the statute confers. No one of them can assert a just claim to jurisdiction exclusively conferred on another or withheld from all.

The Constitution has defined the limits of the judicial power of the United States, but has not prescribed how much of it shall be exercised by the circuit court; consequently, the statute which does prescribe the limits of their jurisdiction can not be in conflict with the Constitution, unless it confers powers not enumerated therein.

* * * * * * *

Such has been the doctrine held by this court since its first establishment. To enumerate all the cases in which it has been either directly advanced or tacitly assumed would be tedious and unnecessary.

Now, just one moment more while I am on this point. Let me give you the case in 18 Wallace, the case of the Sewing Machine Companies:

Circuit courts do not derive their judicial power immediately from the Constitution, as appears with sufficient explicitness from the Constitution itself, as the first section of the third article provides that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." Consequently the jurisdiction of the circuit court in every case must depend upon some act of Congress, as it is clear that Congress, inasmuch as it possesses the power to ordain and establish all courts inferior to the Supreme Court, may also define their jurisdiction.

Now, there is another case, which makes it really a mere waste of time to discuss the proposition.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator from Maryalnd if Congress has not created a perfect——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator from Maryland if the Congress of the United States has not established a circuit court of the United States and given them original jurisdiction in all suits of a civil nature at common law and in equity concurrent with the courts of the several States?

Mr. RAYNER. I will say to the Senator, no.

Mr. NELSON. Is not that the limitation that applies to you and me?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly it does.

Mr. NELSON. If I have not the right to go into the circuit court of the United States, where the amount is $1,999, why should the railroads have a different right?

Mr. RAYNER. Because you can go into State courts and in nine-tenths of the cases the railroads can not get into them, or the shippers either. Now, let me look at the suspending order. Is the Senate in favor of permitting this order to stand in this way?

Such order shall go into effect thirty days after notice to the carrier and shall remain in force and be observed by the carrier, unless the same shall be suspended or modified or set aside by the Commission or be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. I merely want to ask the Senator this question: Why can not the carriers go into the State court?

Mr. RAYNER. What is the question?

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator said that there was a difference between railroads and individuals because the carrier could not go into the State court. Why can not the carrier go into the State court?

Mr. RAYNER. I know there is some little conflict of opinion on the proposition; but does the Senator from Virginia think we can get practical relief from a State court for a violation of the interstate-commerce act?

Mr. DANIEL. I only asked for information.

Mr. RAYNER. Now, let me proceed. The bill provides that this rate is to end at the end of three years. You go into the circuit court. The circuit court suspends the order. Then when you lose in that court you get to the circuit court of appeals and there is another order suspended, and you go to the Supreme Court and there is another order suspended. Recollect, during all this time the challenged rate is in existence, and when the three years run out the order of the Commission expires. I stand upon the proposition as to the word "suspension." I withdraw, if it creates any difference at all between us, the suggestion that any railroad counsel had anything to do with it, but whoever had anything to do with it, if you leave in that word "suspension" without a qualifying clause, without compelling the courts to try cases upon affidavit, where the shipper can be heard, without limiting the time in which the order ought to cease to be effective, and leave it just as you have it in the Hepburn bill, you do not accomplish anything. You never give the shipper one day of the rate the Interstate Commerce Commission fixed. If they reduce the rate from $1 to 75 cents, the earlier rate can be kept in existence during the whole of the three years, and the shipper during the whole of the three years never gets the benefit of the 75-cent rate, and at the end of three years the original rate goes into existence again, according to my construction.

Now, what do you think of a law that has a provision of that sort, whether intentionally or unintentionally? Mr. President, I know the answer. The answer is that it is a constitutional incident; that, if you give the carriers the right to go into court, they ought to have the right to protect their property. That word is a very beautiful word; it is attractive to the sight; but in this bill it is deadly and withering to the touch. I can not accept it. In my judgment, it blights and blasts the whole intendment of the act; and I want to say right here that, rather than leave those words in the bill in the phraseology in which they are now, I would rather that the bill would not pass; I would rather that you would repeal all existing legislation; I would rather abolish the Interstate Commerce Commission, tear down the whole infirm and feeble structure, and let the railroads drive in triumph over its ruins.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I interrupt the Senator before he passes from that point?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose we add, after the word "suspension," the words "but no interlocutory order shall be issued upon any ex-parte affidavit," or "without due notice, that no order shall issue until a full hearing," thus giving to all parties a full opportunity to be heard. Would that be constitutional?

Mr. RAYNER. Oh, the order of suspension is constitutional. I am not denying the constitutionality of the order of suspension; but this suggestion undoubtedly would be a way to a settlement of the difficulty. We know that anybody can go into a United States court; and, without reflecting upon any court or judge, you can go into some United States courts and get an injunction without any trouble at all; without any affidavit you can get an injunction against anybody. You could get an injunction against the Senator from Ohio to keep him from running for the Presidency of the United States. [Laughter.]

Mr. FULTON. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I should like to ask the Senator if the request for such an injunction would not have to be brought in a court of competent jurisdiction?

Mr. RAYNER. Undoubtedly.

We know the orders which have been issued against labor organizations. I do not claim that they are right; I do not say they are wrong; but they have been issued overnight, and while some of the circuits require an affidavit, there are some circuits that do not, though I do not know of a single case of injunction that has been issued by a Maryland circuit court unless it has been upon a hearing and affidavit.

Mr. President, I want to reach the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] now. The Senator from Ohio, in my judgment, has made one of the greatest speeches—and I mean every word that I utter—that I have ever heard in any judicial forum or legislative assemblage. He battled with the cases and swept them down like the chaff before the wind. When he found a case against him, with dauntless and intrepid step he trampled it to the earth, and when he found a whole line of cases against him he tore them from the embrace of his rivals and enlisted them under the persuasive captivity of his charms. [Laughter.]

I will admit that if the Senator had made this argument before the question had arisen in Gibbons v. Ogden he would have carried conviction to the minds of his hearers, and perhaps to the minds of the court.

I must say I have never known a hopeless cause to be managed with such consummate and matchless skill. The tide was dead against him, and when he encountered a cloudburst of decisions from the State and Federal courts, a torrent that would overwhelm a man of ordinary capacity, his genius irradiated the storm, and placidly and serenely he rode upon the billows. [Laughter.]

I have read every word of the speech over and over again, and I want to try now, within a very brief time if I can, to demonstrate that his fabric, beautiful in its architecture and symmetrical in its proportions, vanishes like a vision the moment you apply the battle-ax of the law to the tottering foundation upon which it stands.

I do not agree with a number of my colleagues upon this side of the Chamber that this argument can be passed over, because, Mr. President, the argument which the Senator from Ohio made will be an argument that will be again made in the Supreme Court of the United States. Railroad counsel—and they comprise the most brilliant intellects of the country, because whenever a railroad can procure a man with a great mind it subsidizes or employs him—railroad counsel in the Supreme Court of the United States will argue the proposition that the Senator from Ohio has argued here; and that is, that Congress has no right to make rates, and Congress having no right to make rates, it can not invest a commission with power to make rates. Now, I will meet that question, and I only want to meet it in one way.

The Senator from Ohio says that we are to give a common-law construction to the right to regulate commerce. If he is right about that, he has won his case. If you are to give a common-law construction to the right to regulate commerce between the States—I call the particular attention of the Senator from Ohio to this—if you are to give a common-law construction to the right to regulate commerce, I agree with him that Congress has no right to make rates, because at common law there was no such thing as the making of rates. If we are to construe that clause according to the common law, then Congress has no right at all to make rates, because, as I say, at common law there was no such thing as making rates. The Senator, however, is mistaken. That clause does not receive a common-law construction. The second section referring to rebates, the third section referring to the long and short haul clause, and the fourth section referring to discriminations have all been held to be constitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States, and there is not a single one of them that was ever known to the common law.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. RAYNER. I do.

Mr. FORAKER. What I contended for was that the commerce clause of the Constitution was to be construed with reference to the common law, and I will say to the Senator that the Supreme Court of the United States has held that over and over again as often as it has had occasion to address itself to the consideration of that question, and it did so only five or six weeks ago.

Mr. RAYNER. I know the case.

Mr. FORAKER. It is what is known as the "South Carolina case." The court said in so many words that the Constitution was framed by the authors of it with the common law in mind, and that all its terms and provisions should be construed with reference to the rule of construction obtaining at common law.

Mr. RAYNER. Let me try to show the Senator——

Mr. FORAKER. I have just sent for that decision.

Mr. RAYNER. Let me try to show the Senator, while he is waiting for the decision, that he is wrong, while I make this proposition, and I unhesitatingly make it with great deference to the experience of others perhaps larger than my own. In what is known as the "Standard Oil case," the Schofield case, the very judge who tried it held that he was not deciding it according to the principles of the common law, but he was deciding according to American decisions. Let me show you that at common law there was no such thing as discrimination. Does the Senator from Ohio agree with me upon that point?

Mr. FORAKER. I do not.

Mr. RAYNER. Then, let me see, while the Senator reads the case through, whether I can not satisfy him in five minutes that there was no such thing as discrimination known to the principles of the common law, and therefore, when the Supreme Court of the United States passed upon the constitutionality of the discriminatory clauses, it did not construe that act according to the common law, because there was no such thing as discrimination at the common law——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. RAYNER. I do.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me, in answer to his statement I will read what was said by the Supreme Court in the case of C. & O. R. Co. v. The People ex rel., etc. (67 Ill., 11). The Court says:

> Another perfectly well-settled rule of the common law in regard to common carriers is that they shall not exercise any unjust and injurious discrimination between individuals in their rates of toll.

A hundred cases might just as well be cited as one.

Mr. RAYNER. The trouble about the Senator from Ohio is like that of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], that he selects a line here and there from a case and does not read the whole case. If he does, he will find that it does not read in that way. Let me ask the Senator why not read the whole of the case and not merely give an extract from it?

Mr. FORAKER. Does the Senator question the correctness of the citation I made?

Mr. RAYNER. Not a word of it. Every word of it is there. It reads just exactly as you have read it, but you did not read quite enough of it.

Now, let me proceed. I do not think there will be much doubt about the proposition. This is an annotation that is consulted and followed by almost every lawyer in the land—Thompson's Annotated Cases. Let us see what it says. I will read the reference:

> This section changes the common law, which did not forbid discrimination in rates.

I will hand that over to the Senator from Ohio, because it settles this question. "This section changes the common law, which did not forbid discrimination in rates."

Mr. FORAKER. I will inquire of the Senator whether he has read it all, or just selected one sentence?

Mr. RAYNER. I have read every word of this quotation. If there is any more the Senator would like me to read, I shall be very glad to oblige him.

Mr. FORAKER. Oh, no; what I said was in response to the pleasantry—for I assume it was such—when the Senator charged me with not having read the entire extract.

Mr. RAYNER. Entirely so. I only meant to say that if the Senator had read the whole of that case, he would find that it does not bear out the construction he put upon it. There was no such thing as discrimination at common law.

Now, let me give you upon this question of discrimination an extract from the volume of Mr. Walter C. Noyes, on American Railroad Rates, so we can see whether the Senator is right or I am right. This book was written by Judge Walter C. Noyes, the partner of the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE]. The author is evidently a very able man, and this book is upon the side of the Senator from Ohio, and therefore I suppose I have the right to quote from it. Let us see what he says on this subject, and I will ask the attention of the Senator from Ohio to this:

> Under the common law, as stated by the English courts, it was the duty of a common carrier to afford equal facilities to all his patrons and to exact only a reasonable charge for his services. But he was not bound to treat all his customers with absolute equality. So long as he transported for every shipper at a reasonable rate it was held that no one could complain if he chose to carry for some at a lower rate than for others.
> The injustice of the rule of the common law when applied to railroads, and the desirability of equal rates, induced legislation in England at an early date having for its object the prevention of all forms of discrimination. The first statute was contained in the "railway clauses consolidation act" of 1845, which prohibited common carriers from charging more to one person than during the same time they charged others for the same kind of service.

What was the necessity of the English act for common carriers? How will the Senator from Ohio explain the English consolidation act of 1845, and how will he explain the other act of equality? The second section of this act is directed against discrimination. Judge Noyes was speaking of our act as modeled after the section known as the "equality act" in the "English railway clauses consolidation act," and the third section is aimed at unjust discrimination, and is modeled on the act passed in 1873.

There was no such thing as discrimination. I care not what any judge of a nisi prius court may say, discrimination was unknown to the common law. Reasonable rates were known to the common law, and therefore the Senator from Ohio is wrong, I respectfully submit to him, in his fundamental proposition that you are to construe this constitutional clause according to the common law.

Mr. FORAKER. I never contended—and that is what I am trying to get the Senator's attention to—that the statute should be construed according to the rule of the common law. My contention was that the Constitution of the United States was to be construed according to the rule of the common law.

Mr. RAYNER. That is what I said. Did I say "statute?"

Mr. FORAKER. You said "statute."

Mr. RAYNER. I said "Constitution." I meant to assert very deferentially the proposition that the power to regulate commerce, given in the Constitution is not to be construed by the common law, because under that power we have passed a statute providing against discriminations; and if it were to be construed by the principles of the common law then all the sections of that statute that relate to discriminations are unconstitutional, because there was no such thing as discrimination at common law. I plant myself upon that proposition under the cases.

Now, Mr. President, let us come to the second point. The Senator from Ohio makes another proposition. The Senator will appreciate what I think about his argument, for I think it is an argument that must be answered. His second proposition is a formidable one. It is that under the pending bill there is a blending of legislative and judicial powers. Now, just for a moment on that subject. What is the Interstate Commerce Commission? The best definition I have ever known to be given of the Interstate Commerce Commission is the definition that Judge Jackson gave in a case in 37 Federal Reporter. He said "its functions are partly judicial"—not "quasi judicial." I do not like that word "quasi." I heard a great constitutional lawyer in Maryland once ask another lawyer whether he thought a statute was constitutional. The reply was that it was "quasi constitutional." I do not like that word "quasi." Judge Jackson said "its functions are partly judicial, partly executive, and partly administrative."

You go before the Interstate Commerce Commission. What does it do? It sets aside a challenged rate. What is that? It is a judicial function; but, Mr. President, it is not the function of a court, because the Interstate Commerce Commission is not clothed with the power and the process that are necessary to enforce its decrees. After it sets aside the challenged rate, what does it do under this bill? It orders a maximum rate. What is that? A legislative function? If it is a legislative function, then we are gone. After the setting aside judicially of a challenged rate, if the fixing of a new rate is a legislative function, either in whole or in part, then this legislation is absolutely void, because we can not intrust a subordinate tribunal with the exercise of legislative functions. But it is not a legislative function; it is an administrative function.

The whole trouble that has arisen is from the unfortunate—I ought not to say "unfortunate;" "inadvertent," perhaps—expression of the court in the Maximum Rate cases, in 167 United States, where it uses the word "legislative" instead of "administrative." The moment you admit it is a legislative function, the argument of the Senator from Ohio becomes unanswerable, because I apprehend no one of us believes that we can impart legislative functions to anybody.

As I understand the philosophy of the law it is this: We are performing the legislative function and the Commission, in fixing the rate, is performing an administrative function, to make the rate conform to the legislative standard that we here enact. The Senator from Ohio says the different States have settled the point in their constitutions. He is wrong about that. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to this point: Did Mississippi have a constitution when the Mississippi case, in 116 United States, was decided?

Mr. FORAKER. No; not at that time. But I called attention to that fact, and I called attention to the additional fact that the statute itself undertook to make the duties of the Commission administrative; but evidently it was because of the apprehensions learned lawyers came to have as to the constitutionality of that statute that only a very few years—four or five at the outside—after that statute was passed they amended their constitution so as to, by the constitution, provide that there should be a commission that could exercise these powers.

Mr. RAYNER. We both agree upon the proposition that when this case in 116 United States was decided, Mississippi had no constitutional provision in reference to any rate commission.

Mr. FORAKER. It had none; but the statute, the Senator will remember—and I put the upholding of it upon that ground—does provide that the duty shall be administrative—that is to say, that it undertakes to prescribe standards, not as definitely as it should have done——

Mr. RAYNER. I understand that.

Mr. FORAKER. By which the commission could figure out mathematically what the rate should be.

Mr. RAYNER. Before the Senator takes his seat, I will ask was there any constitution when, in 134 United States, this direct question in the Minnesota case was decided?

Mr. FORAKER. There was not. But the statute there expressly provided that the commission should do nothing more than simply recommend a rate, and if the rate recommended be not adopted by the railroads, the commission could do what? Go into court and ask the court to enforce it. The commission had no power under the statute involved in the Minnesota case to make a rate; it had power to recommend a rate. That is the exact language employed in the statute.

Mr. RAYNER. If anyone can read the Minnesota law and say it is not a more drastic law than the law we propose to enact, I can not understand the English language.

But passing over that point, let me ask the Senator another question. Did the Senator from Ohio—or am I mistaken about this—early in the session offer a bill in which he gave the courts a right to fix rates?

Mr. FORAKER. No; I did not. The Senator from Ohio introduced a bill, which he intends to move as a substitute for the pending bill after he gets the Senate properly educated [laughter], which provides that the court shall have jurisdiction to enjoin so much of any rate that is challenged as the court may find to be excessive.

Mr. RAYNER. I agree with the Senator upon the proposition, as he shall presently see. Then, does the court fix the rate?

Mr. FORAKER. No; not at all. Mr. President, the statute already fixes the rate by saying that the rate shall be just and reasonable; but when a shipper challenges that rate on the ground that it is higher than is just and reasonable, a question is raised which the court will hear and determine; and when the court finds from the testimony submitted what is just and reasonable and enjoins all in excess of it, it simply gives effect to the rate that Congress has already prescribed. The court fixes nothing except only it compels an observance of the rate declared by the Congress.

Mr. RAYNER. May I ask the Senator, is that a legislative act upon the part of the court?

Mr. FORAKER. It is not.

Mr. RAYNER. Well, how is it a legislative act upon the part of the Commission to do exactly the same thing?

Mr. FORAKER. The Commission does not do the same thing.

Mr. RAYNER. Let me read the Senator the language in his bill.

Mr. FORAKER. Let me answer the Senator's question. The Commission fixes the rate according to the provisions of this bill. The court does not fix a rate; the court simply finds what is the rate that the Congress fixes, and gives effect to it.

Mr. RAYNER. The Commission does not fix the rate. The Commission fixes the maximum rate.

Mr. FORAKER. Ah, Mr. President, I referred to that the other day as a juggle of words.

Mr. RAYNER. There is no juggle about it.

Mr. FORAKER. It is nothing but a juggle of words, and it never was intended to be anything but a juggle of words. Now, what the Commission does is to find what is a just and reasonable rate. That may be anywhere between 40 and 80, perhaps. When it names that rate, then the law says that shall be the maximum rate.

Mr. RAYNER. Does the Senator from Ohio think that that is a juggle of words in reference to differentials? Does he think the word "maximum" is a juggle of words in reference to differentials? In other words, does the Senator think that if they had put in this bill a right to fix rates it would have the same effect as just fixing a maximum rate in reference to differentials?

Mr. FORAKER. It does not make a bit of difference; that is what I am trying to explain; to say that a just and reasonable rate which the Commission names shall be the maximum rate is not different from the Commission naming a specific rate, because in both cases it is the judgment of the Commission that becomes the law of the case, in one case just as much as in the other. When I say a "juggle of words" I do not mean anything offensive to anybody; I simply mean to characterize it as I think it should be, because the manifest intention of that provision was to avoid just what the Senator recognizes must be avoided. Now, I say it does not make a bit of difference whether they fix a specific rate or name what should be a maximum rate. It is the Commission fixing the rate. That is as clear as anything can be.

Mr. RAYNER. If the Senator is right in that view, it is an inevitable conclusion that under this bill they can substantially fix differentials. I would not vote for this bill if it gave the Commission the right to fix differentials.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. RAYNER. I am taking a longer time than I anticipated. Will the Senator give me just about a minute or two until I make an additional statement?

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator requested me to answer him, and that is the only reason I have interrupted him.

Mr. RAYNER. But you have answered.

Mr. FORAKER. I want to add an authority. The Senator seems to think it is a making of rates for the court to enjoin all in excess of what it finds to be just and reasonable.

Mr. RAYNER. I am with you on that, and if the Senator will wait until I finish he will see that I am. I am with you on the proposition on review to give the court the right to fix the rate.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not want to put it that way, Mr. President.

Mr. RAYNER. Well, I do.

Mr. FORAKER. The courts can not fix the rates, but the courts can say what is just and reasonable and enjoin the charging of anything in excess of it, not on the ground that it is fixing a rate, but on the ground that it is fixing what the rate is that Congress prescribed. That is not an open question. That identical question is absolutely settled on authority in more than one case.

Mr. RAYNER. I know it was settled in the Janvrin case in 174 Massachusetts. It was settled in the Kingwood Gas and Coal and Iron case, in 81 Federal Reporter, and, in my judgment, it was settled in the Missouri Pacific case.

Mr. FORAKER. It was settled in the stock-yards case, and settled absolutely and explicitly in two other cases in the Federal Reporter.

Mr. RAYNER. But let us get back.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not want to interrupt the Senator——

Mr. RAYNER. I have no objection to an interruption. The trouble with the Senator from Ohio is this, I think. I do not detract a moment from the weight of his argument. I have never heard any address upon any subject that has given me more intense interest and satisfaction. My only objection to it is that the Senator is all wrong. [Laughter.] He construes the Constitution as it was framed, instead of construing it as it has been interpreted. Marshall said, in Gibbons v. Ogden, that the Constitution was not an instrument of definitions; it was an instrument of enumerations. So far as I am concerned, I believe to-day that Alexander Hamilton would never identify the Constitution under the glare of the interpreting decisions. I believe the prophecy of Patrick Henry, in the Virginia convention, that if Marshall ever had the power he would make a new Constitution for us has been fulfilled. Let me tell the Senator from Ohio that constitutions, as a rule, are not made by conventions; that laws are not made by legislatures. They simply state propositions which the courts interpret, reject, or ratify.

A tremendous power, a power when placed in a court of ultimate resort greater than any power possessed by any sovereign on this earth. I know that under the Supreme Court decisions the Constitution has passed through various vicissitudes of fortune; and if the Senator from Ohio were to ask me the question whether the men who put in the instrument the simple clause that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce among the States ever contemplated that Congress would eventually assume control over all the instrumentalities of transportation on this continent, I would say never until Gibbons v. Ogden came thundering down the corridors.

I have been trained in the strictest school of constitutional construction, though I am not a partisan and I care very little for party organizations when supreme principles are involved. I should like to say to the Senator from Ohio that it was impossible to define what the word "commerce" meant. It would have been ruinous in the convention to have entered into a definition of the word "commerce." The word "commerce" had to be bequeathed to future generations without a definition, and in looking over that whole instrument there is not a single clause in it greater than this clause which, by its adaptability to future conditions, its ubiquity, and its wisdom, satisfies me that the Constitution of the United States is the greatest compact ever framed by the mind of man and the greatest political charter ever delivered to the human race, exhibiting, as has been well said of the patriot to whom we owe our existence as a Republic, "in one glow of associated beauty, the pride of every model and the perfection of every master."

Mr. President, I have cheerfully and willingly yielded to interruptions and have consumed more time than I intended to use. I have no objection to them.

I want to state now what my position is, because after these speeches are made people will say, "What does the speaker propose to do on this bill? How does he stand on the bill?" I want to tell you how I stand on this bill. I am in favor of the Hepburn bill, or the Hepburn-Dolliver bill. I am in favor of two amendments to that bill. I want an amendment placed in the bill creating a court. If there is any ambiguity about the bill, let us settle that ambiguity. It can not hurt to give a court to the bill. It can not possibly do any harm. Why take the chances of the unconstitutionality of the measure? I want to put in an amendment giving the court the right to try, upon the application of the carrier, or the shipper either, the question of just compensation. I want the carriers, when the Commission has decided against them, to have the right to go into court and try the question of unjust compensation, but without any suspending order—not a suspending order until the case is decided by a court of competent jurisdiction. I want the words "unjust compensation" inserted. Why will not those words answer? Why go into the word "confiscatory?" "Confiscatory" does not mean anything. You can not prove, I want to say to the Senator from Iowa, that a single rate is confiscatory. Mr. Nimmo, the statistician of the Treasury Department, says that in the last ten years there have been three thousand million freight transactions. You can not prove upon a single transaction that a rate is confiscatory. Let us take the rate between Washington and Baltimore on the Baltimore and Ohio. We will say the rate is $1 per passenger. Suppose the Interstate Commerce Commission should reduce it to 90 cents per passenger; does anybody suppose that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company could prove that 90 cents was a confiscatory rate? It could not possibly do it.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Then it would seem that the railroads ought to obey that order.

Mr. RAYNER. We passed that branch of the discussion long ago. I am in favor of the railroads obeying the order, but I want to give the railroads, and you want to give the railroads, a court of final review. The only difference between us is this: I want the constitutional words "unjust compensation" put in the bill. I do not want the word "confiscatory" inserted. I do not want to drive a railroad to the point of making it prove that a rate is absolutely confiscatory. I want to use the words "unjust compensation;" and I will tell the Senator from Iowa why I want to do this. Because the Supreme Court has definitely passed upon those words, and I am going to take the liberty now of reading the decision. It is only a few lines. I am willing to incorporate that decision—the Nebraska decision—in this proposed law. It is found in 169 United States; and I am willing to incorporate that decision in this proposed law for fear that the Supreme Court might, perhaps, reverse it and give not quite the latitude to the Constitution which they did in that case. I want to use the words "unjust compensation" because the fifth amendment says "unjust compensation." Let me read this; and that is about the last case I will read—I refer to the Nebraska case—and let us see whether the Senator from Iowa does not think that the words "unjust compensation" carry everything with them.

Mr. DOLLIVER rose.

Mr. RAYNER. Just a moment.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I wish to say to the Senator that so far as I am concerned I am entirely familiar with the case.

Mr. RAYNER. Perhaps we are not all as familiar with it as is the Senator from Iowa. Let us look at these words, because they are very interesting, not only to a man in the profession, but to a layman; and what more do the railroads want than this, and they ought not to get less? I want to do what is right.

We hold, however—

Said the Supreme Court—

that the basis of all calculations as to the reasonableness of rates to be charged by a corporation maintaining a highway under legislative sanction must be the fair value of the property being used by it for the convenience of the public. And in order to ascertain that value the original cost of construction—

That is right—

the amount expended in permanent improvements, the amount and market value—

"Market value"— of its bonds and stock, the present as compared with the original cost of construction, the probable earning capacity of the property under particular rates prescribed by statute, and the sum required to meet operating expenses, are all matters for consideration, and are to be given such weight as may be just and right in each case. We do not say that there may not be other matters to be regarded in estimating the value of the property. What the company is entitled to ask is a fair return upon the value of that which it employs for the public convenience. On the other hand, what the public is entitled to demand is that no more be exacted from it for the use of a public highway than the services rendered by it are reasonably worth.

That was under an interpretation of the words "unjust compensation;" and if I remember aright, the Supreme Court held in this case that the road was not given just compensation, and therefore it declared the act to be void.

I want to establish a court, if it is deemed necessary. If Senators, however, think I am wrong, and they are willing to let the bill stand as it is, I shall make no point upon it. I am perfectly willing to vote for it without any court in it, but when you have a serious constitutional question, why not avoid the conflict and put in a court?

I say those words will do it. And if you put in a court, I am willing that the court shall review, not on appeal, because you can not appeal. The Supreme Court has said in the case in 174 United States, the Dawes Commission case, and also in 172 United States, that there is no appeal; that you are entitled to have a review; what we call in equity an original bill in the nature of a bill of review. I am willing to give the court the power of review, and I am willing in that case that the court shall decide whether the Interstate Commerce Commission has given just compensation, not whether it has confiscated the property of the road, because I think that is absolutely ridiculous, as the railroads would never be able to prove it. I insist that you put the words "unjust compensation" in the body of the bill.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I am very reluctant to interrupt the Senator, as he has been very accommodating in that direction; but I understood him to say a moment ago that even without a provision for a court of review he is willing to vote for this bill. I want to ask him if, as I understood him to state a few moments ago, it is his deliberate judgment as a lawyer that this bill would be declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court, would he vote for it and thereby give the people a stone when they have been asking for bread?

Mr. RAYNER. Before the Senator takes his seat, I will ask him does he agree with me that this bill is unconstitutional in failing to provide for a court?

Mr. KNOX. Without the slightest doubt.

Mr. RAYNER. Then I refer him to the Senator from Iowa, who disagrees with him.

Mr. KNOX. Having answered categorically the Senator's question, may I ask an answer to mine?

Mr. RAYNER. I will not only answer the Senator's question categorically, but in full.

I have over and over again in legislative bodies voted for bills that I thought perhaps were unconstitutional, without being absolutely positive about it, in order to give the courts the right to try the question. If I vote against the bill because I think it is unconstitutional and the bill does not pass, the courts do not have any right to try the question, and my judgment determines the matter. On the other hand, if the bill is unconstitutional, the courts can decide it to be unconstitutional, and I have done my duty in giving the court the right to try the question. On an important measure of this sort, with nothing else before us, on the passage of the Hepburn bill or nothing at all, I would take the Hepburn bill with all its infirmities and weakness.

Mr. KNOX. But may I not ask the Senator from Maryland would he not even be doing a higher duty if he persisted in his efforts to make the bill a constitutional one?

Mr. RAYNER. I will offer an amendment, and I suppose the Senator from Pennsylvania will offer one—there will be plenty of amendments of that sort offered without my doing so, but I will certainly offer it if no one else does—I will offer an amendment vesting in a court of competent jurisdiction the power to determine the question of unjust compensation and do all I can to get the amendment through.

I do not think there is such a conflict of opinion here in the Senate. I do not think this contest is quite as bitter as it seems to be upon its surface. I think we are pretty close to a settlement. I do not think the Senator from Iowa will object, for fear that he might be wrong, to a clause inserted in this bill providing for a court.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I have never objected to an affirmative statement in this bill giving the circuit court of the United States the jurisdiction which I think it has now. The thing I have objected to is to so framing the provision as to enlarge the jurisdiction of the circuit court and make it practically an appellate interstate commerce commission.

Mr. RAYNER. I agree with you entirely. I would not put in the words of the Esch-Townsend bill. I would not use the words in the President's message. I would not use the words of the Interstate Commerce Commission bill. I would not use the words "the justness or the reasonableness of the order." They mean nothing. I would use the constitutional words "unjust compensation," because you can always determine the question of unjust compensation by a comparison of rates. The best way to arrive at whether the compensation is just or not, the Supreme Court has said, is by a comparison. I want to follow the Constitution. I want to follow the fifth amendment, that Congress shall pass no law taking away private property without due process of law and without just compensation. I want to incorporate that in the body of the bill, and then I want to give the court the right to try that question, and I want to cut down these suspending orders.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator from Maryland make a dictinction between rates that are just and reasonable and those which afford just compensation?

Mr. RAYNER. I will say to the Senator from Rhode Island that that is one of the most difficult questions that could possibly be asked, to be properly answered. I make a distinction between "confiscatory" and "unjust compensation."

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes.

Mr. RAYNER. I say there is a broad distinction.

Mr. ALDRICH. There is no question about it.

Mr. RAYNER. I say a railroad can go into court and prove that it is being unjustly compensated without being able to prove that its property has been confiscated. Confiscation means forfeiture. As I recollect it comes from the Latin word which means treasury. It has the same root as the word "fiscal." It implies a forfeiture. If you ask me whether there is any difference between "unjust compensation" and "unreasonably low" I say possibly there may be a margin of difference. But it is very narrow and very difficult to define.

I think if, under the Nebraska decision, you go into the Supreme Court of the United States, the Supreme Court will say this: "People do not build railroads for amusement. They are entitled to a profit." Does anyone suppose men will expend millions of dollars in building a railroad simply to get 3 or 4 per cent on the bonds they own? The Supreme Court has said: "You must pay the operating expenses. You have to pay the interest on the bonded indebtedness. And then you must pay fair dividends on its stock." I will tell you what question they have left open. I have examined these cases very thoroughly. I want to say to the Senate, because I believe I may, that before Thompson's annotated edition appeared I annotated all the State and Federal authorities on this question for my own guidance. I came to this conclusion: If you put in this bill the definition of "unjust compensation," under the Nebraska case, you get all you want.

I will tell you what the court left open. I did not read that part of the Nebraska case. Would the Senator like me to read it? It is very interesting, and will take but a moment. The court did not pass on the question of allowing interest upon overcapitalized roads. You take a trunk line, and it buys a branch line for $5,000,000, and then it trebles and quadruples the capital to the extent of $20,000,000 or $30,000,000. They refer to that case. It is not necessary for me to read it. They state that they do not pass on a case of that kind. The difficulty is where the stock of overcapitalized roads gets into the hands of an innocent holder. Why should not the innocent holder of the stock of an overcapitalized road be entitled to dividends? I believe in having a court, and then strike out the suspending orders. You will not insist on these suspending orders. There is not a man on the other side of the House who when that question comes to issue will stand up and defend the suspending orders.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I agree with what the Senator says about the difficulty involved in retaining the equity jurisdiction of the circuit court of the United States, and I say that no provision has been attempted to limit or abridge the equity powers of the courts solely for the reason that it was the opinion of those who were interested in framing the bill that such a provision would introduce an uncertain constitutional element into the situation.

I want to add a word, if the honorable Senator from Maryland will permit me. Here is a railroad complaining of a wrong done by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It brings a petition in equity, stating that the order takes its property without due process of law; that it takes its property for the public use without just compensation; that an irreparable injury is about to be done it by the imposition of rates fixed by the order of the Commission. I want to ask my honorable friend how is it possible for Congress to send that petitioner into a court of equity after you have taken away from that court the right to preserve the status quo pendente lite. And if you can take it away altogether, how do you propose, under our form of government, to send one litigant into court entirely free to invoke all its equity power while you send others there limited in their right, as you have suggested?

Mr. RAYNER. You are on the other side of the case now. You are in favor of keeping in the suspending orders.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I am in favor of so framing the bill that it will pass the criticism of the courts of the United States. I will say to the Senator from Maryland that he has undertaken to muss up the question by his discourse, and I am afraid that, on the whole, his discourse has not strengthened the cause of the public against the railroads.

Mr. RAYNER. I am inclined to think, with great deference, that it has cleared it up a little more than the present attitude of the Senator from Iowa—decidedly more. If the Senator from Iowa insists upon leaving in this bill the suspending orders, we might as well defeat this bill. So think we all of us on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I will say that I have no objection to putting in any limitations you please of that character. I spent a good many hours and I may say days and nights meditating upon that aspect of the question, and if the lawyers and the constitutional experts in the Senate think that can be done, I have no objection to putting it in and will not vote against it, but I should like to have it accompanied, as the honorable Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] suggested the other day, with a proviso that if the courts find it invalid, it shall not be held to invalidate other portions of this act.

Mr. RAYNER. I will say to the Senator from Iowa, and I am not revealing any secret, that I am trying to follow an amendment contemplated by the Senator from Texas, and the views I express, I am warranted in saying, are perhaps the views of the Senator from Texas, after an informal conference between us. Therefore, if he will accept those views, we can make an agreement here and now. But the trouble is that the Senator from Iowa has no authority to speak for his side at all.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I have no authority to speak for anyone but myself and the constituency I represent here.

Mr. RAYNER. I think we will be a unit, perhaps. I hope so. I can not speak for anyone but myself, but it looks very much as if we will agree upon a proposition. I am not prepared to say but that gentlemen may have some modifications to offer, but perhaps we can agree upon an amendment providing against the suspending orders, and I do not think the Democratic side of this Chamber would permit the bill to pass, if I could help it, with a provision putting it within the power of a Federal court, without affidavit, without bond, without a single qualification, to grant an order that stays the operation of the rate prescribed until the very rate expires against which the order is passed.

Mr. President, before I close, while I am on this point, let me ask another question. You have your penalties in this bill. Does the Senator from Ohio think that the imposition of these penalties is constitutional?

Mr. FORAKER rose.

Mr. RAYNER. Does the Senator from Ohio think——

Mr. TILLMAN. You mean the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. RAYNER. No. The Senator from Iowa is studying the subject of creating differences between himself and myself when no difference exists.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I did not know the Senator was alluding to me. He has invariably said "the Senator from Ohio" when he referred to me. I did not undertake to set him right on everything.

Mr. RAYNER. The truth is, you and I are together.

Mr. DOLLIVER. We will get along a little better if you would use a little more friendly expressions toward the bill. When I find a man denouncing the act of the House of Representatives and of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce as a fraud, I feel like saying we can get along without such help and without such defense.

Mr. RAYNER. Where have I ever said that?

Mr. DOLLIVER. In the Senate.

Mr. RAYNER. Denouncing the act of the Senate committee as a fraud? Let us get it straight.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I referred to your description——

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator from Iowa had better keep his temper.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I intend to do that.

Mr. RAYNER. I have not meant to say anything which by the remotest insinuation would reflect upon anybody, and if I am a little earnest, you must not take that as condemnation. I have given the committee credit. I think the committee has done its work splendidly. It could not have done the work any better than by placing the bill in the hands of a Democratic Senator.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I will not dispute that. But what I desire to call the attention of the Senator to is, in referring to the mechanism of this bill, he said that it amounted to a fraud. If I am mistaken about that——

Mr. RAYNER. If it will prevent any difficulty, I will withdraw that word. Will that do? I withdraw it with the best feeling in the world. Personally, there is no one for whom I have a higher feeling than for the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I am loath to break up this colloquy, but I rejoice to see how near together the advocates of this measure are coming. [Laughter.] I think the time for me to introduce my substitute is almost here.

But I did not rise for any other purpose than to keep the promise I made to the Senator a while ago, when I told him I would send to the clerk's office of the Supreme Court and get the decision recently rendered by the Supreme Court in what is known as the "South Carolina dispensary case," in which the court had announced (and I refer to this only because it is the latest utterance on the subject) that the Constitution is to be interpreted, as I said in the remarks to which he referred, in the light of the common law and with reference to it. The framers of the Constitution being common-law lawyers, they made the Constitution with the interpretation of that law before them. At page 3 of the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case referred to occurs the following:

> It must also be remembered that the framers of the Constitution were not mere visionaries, toying with speculations or theories, but practical men, dealing with the facts of political life as they understood them, putting into form the government they were creating, and prescribing in language clear and intelligible the powers that government was to take. Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, in Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat. 1, 188), well declared:
> "As men whose intentions require no concealment generally employ the words which most directly and aptly express the ideas they intend to convey, the enlightened patriots who framed our Constitution and the people who adopted it must be understood to have employed words in their natural sense and to have intended what they have said."
> One other fact must be borne in mind, and that is that in interpreting the Constitution we must have recourse to the common law. As said by Mr. Justice Matthews, in Smith v. Alabama (124 U. S., 465, 478):
> "The interpretation of the Constitution of the United States is necessarily influenced by the fact that its provisions are framed in the language of the English common law, and are to be read in the light of its history."
> And by Mr. Justice Gray, in United States v. Wong Kim Ark. (169 U. S., 649, 654):
> "In this, as in other respects, it must be interpreted in the light of the common law, the principles and history of which were familiarly known to the framers of the Constitution." (Minor v. Happersett, 21 Wall., 162; Ex parte Wilson, 114 U. S., 417, 422; Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S., 616, 624, 625; Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S., 465.) "The language of the Constitution, as has been well said, could not be understood without reference to the common law." (1 Kent Com., 336; Bradley, J., in Moore v. United States, 91 U. S., 270, 274.)

Now, Mr. President——

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator will bear with me just a moment.

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. All I was contending for in the remarks to which the Senator addressed himself was not that the statute under consideration was to be construed in the light of the common law and according to the rules at common law, but that the Constitution of the United States, having reference to that particular clause, the commerce clause, which I was discussing, must be construed in the light of the common law and with reference to the common law. That is the only contention I made; and I have never before, in the limited experience I have had at the bar, heard anyone question the fact that the Constitution was framed by its authors in the light of the common law and was to be interpreted according to the rules of the common law.

Mr. RAYNER. We can not agree upon that proposition. The courts will have to decide it. We have different views upon that. It is an academic question largely. I presume the Senator from Ohio and I do not agree at all on this bill. I do agree with the Senator from Iowa. I am sorry if in anything I have said I have given offense to the Senator from Iowa, because we want to welcome him to the councils of our party. We do not want to offend him when he is with us.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. RAYNER. Let me put in a word.

Mr. FORAKER. I thought the Senator had yielded the floor.

Mr. RAYNER. I have, except that I should like to read to the Senator from Rhode Island a few words, and then I will yield to you.

Mr. FORAKER. Give me a minute on this.

Mr. RAYNER. Very well.

Mr. FORAKER. I intended to quote an authority.

Mr. RAYNER. I say there is a difference between us. I can not agree with you.

Mr. FORAKER. I am not asking the Senator——

Mr. RAYNER. I may be wrong; you may be wrong.

Mr. FORAKER. I am not asking the Senator to agree with me, but I simply wished to call his attention to the latest utterance of the Supreme Court, not six weeks old.

Mr. RAYNER. I would have to put against that the best text writers in the United States, that that distinction did not exist at common law.

Mr. FORAKER. When the Senator tells me that he places against the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States an annotation by a text writer I do not wonder that he is supporting the bill that is in the hands of the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. RAYNER. Of course the Senator has read all of that opinion that it is necessary to read—do not misunderstand me about this—but if you were to read the whole case with the authorities it does not bear the construction the Senator has given to it.

It would be impossible to construe the Constitution of the United States by the common law. Four-fifths of the Constitution relates to subjects that never existed at common law at all. On the very subject we are discussing now—railroads and discriminations among railroads—the decision of Marshall in Gibbons v. Ogden was that it is not a Constitution of definitions, it is a Constitution of enumerations. The word "commerce" does not bear the construction now that it did at common law. So you can take clause after clause of the Constitution. It is the adaptability of the different provisions of the Constitution to future conditions that makes it the instrument that it is.

But, Mr. President, I should like very much to pass from this point, because it is an academic point. Therefore I pass to another proposition. We are engaged with a practical proposition. The Senator from Rhode Island has asked me a very important question, and I want to answer it by reference to this case.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. RAYNER. With pleasure.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator has just now made another very important statement, important if it be true, that the practical effect of the Constitution is constantly changing, and commerce does not mean to-day what it meant when the Constitution was framed. I wish to call his attention to the fact that on that subject——

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator is going now into a moot discussion. Does not the Senator from Ohio think it is rather a waste of time to those of us who have read Gibbons v. Ogden? If you want to know why I think the Constitution has changed, I think that the Supreme Court of the United States has changed it; but I want to construe it according to the Supreme Court decisions, and not according to the common-law definition.

Mr. FORAKER. All I want to do is to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Supreme Court has spoken on that point in that identical case in the following language:

> The Constitution is a written instrument. As such its meaning does not alter. That which it meant when adopted it means now.

I think that is a proposition I do not need to argue, and therefore the argument I made the other day which had reference to the meaning of the word "commerce" and the meaning of the words "to regulate" was entirely appropriate, whether it be taken with reference to the Constitution at the time it was adopted or be taken with reference to the present.

Mr. RAYNER. I said at the beginning that I have never read or heard a greater argument than the Senator made, but I take the liberty of believing that the Senator was wrong. I think he made a wonderful argument, however.

Mr. FORAKER. I appreciate the Senator's compliment, because——

Mr. RAYNER. No one could have spoken of the Senator more highly than myself.

Mr. FORAKER. There is no Senator I think more capable of passing a just judgment on a legal argument than the Senator from Maryland. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAYNER. Yes; I do not intend it as any mere compliment to the Senator from Ohio. I have heard the best arguments and the best lawyers at the American bar, especially in my own State. I came to the bar in the latter days of Reverdy Johnson and Steele and Wallis and men who were the greatest of their generation, and I say in the presence of the Senate I have never heard a greater argument than the Senator from Ohio delivered, and I have said it will not do to pass over that argument. I can not agree with him on the proposition that the Constitution is to be construed strictly by the principles of the common law. I believe you must invoke the common law to interpret legal definitions, but when you come to a subject-matter like commerce you can not define commerce by any principle of the common law that existed at the time the commerce clause was put in the Constitution.

Mr. FORAKER rose.

Mr. RAYNER. Now, let me answer this argument and then I will submit to any interruption at all.

> If a railroad corporation has bonded its property for an amount that exceeds its fair value, or if its capitalization is largely fictitious, it may not impose upon the public the burden of such increased rates as may be required for the purpose of realizing profits upon such excessive valuation or fictitious capitalization; and the apparent value of the property and franchises used by the corporation, as represented by its stock, bonds, and obligations, is not alone to be considered when determining the rates that may be reasonably charged.

I want the Senator from Iowa to understand that when I said I shall vote for the Hepburn bill I shall ask that we put an amendment in the Hepburn bill constituting a court. I shall vote for it, notwithstanding the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, whether there is a court put in it or not. I shall vote for an amendment providing against suspending orders. Now, you have my vote on this bill. There are some little changes in phraseology I should like to make. I shall vote for the Hepburn bill. I shall vote for an amendment constituting a court to try the question of unjust compensation. If that amendment is lost I shall vote for the bill. Then I shall vote for an amendment against the suspending orders; and I believe, without having any authority to say so, that you will find the Democratic party almost a unit upon those propositions.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to say just one word on the question of overcapitalization.

Mr. FORAKER. Before the Senator passes to that——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator asked me a question a few minutes ago and the Senator from Iowa responded before I had an opportunity to answer the question. I do not know that the Senator is particular about having an answer now. If he be, I can give it now or later. The question was whether I believed the provision in the bill with respect to penalties is constitutional.

Mr. RAYNER. I beg pardon. I refer now to the Reagan case, 154 United States. I wish I had time to read that and the stock yard case, 193 United States. The Reagan case is a good decision. My position is this: Some of the business associations of Baltimore have asked me to vote against any rate-making bill.

Mr. FORAKER. Why does not the Senator do it?

Mr. RAYNER. Because I follow my own instincts and conscientious convictions, and I do not permit any organization—labor organization, business organization, or any other organization, however highly I respect them—to direct me when I am in the line of public duty.

Mr. FORAKER. Does the Senator think he is in the line of public business to-day when voting for a bill that is unconstitutional, in his judgment?

Mr. RAYNER. I vote to give the court the right. As I said to the Senator from Pennsylvania, I am not sitting in constitutional judgment on this bill. But we have passed that point. Let me get now to the penalty.

Mr. FORAKER. I only want to say to the Senator that I discussed that in the remarks I made the other day, and I am in full accord with what I understand to be his view with respect to the penalties provided in the bill.

Mr. RAYNER. But the Senator is not in accord with what I am going to say now, and I beg him not to take his seat. I am very glad he is in accord with me on something. I am glad to be able to say that. This is the first proposition we have agreed on. The Senator agrees with me that these penalties are unconstitutional. Is that correct, may I ask the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FORAKER. I said that I thought before passing the bill with this provision about burdensome penalties in it we should add a proviso that in case of litigation they should not be allowed to accumulate. I believe, in view of what was said in the Cotting case, which I quoted at length, the Supreme Court would hold the law to be unconstitutional if we should pass it without such a proviso.

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator says if the carrier disobeys the order of the Commission he is to pay $5,000 a day.

Mr. FORAKER. Five thousand dollars for every offense. It may be a hundred times $5,000 a day.

Mr. RAYNER. Just say $5,000 a day. In three years——

Mr. FORAKER. That is the mildest possible amount.

Mr. RAYNER. In three years, by the time it would get to the Supreme Court, it would be nearly $5,000,000. In other words, it would pay $5,000,000 for the right to try a constitutional question. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. RAYNER. I do.

Mr. KNOX. May I ask the Senator a question, because I am deeply interested in it myself, and I am perfectly certain every other Senator is equally so? He has said over and over again, and has made his meaning perfectly clear, that he would be in favor of striking out the power to suspend the order and allow the order to stand until the final decree upon the finding of the Commission. Can the Senator refer the Senate to any authority where a court of equity has jurisdiction, which, as I understand, means the power to hear and decide according to equity, which decides that in a particular case it can not do equity as equity is understood?

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator and I are closely associated, so far as sitting near each other is concerned.

Mr. KNOX. And I hope otherwise.

Mr. RAYNER. We have discussed this question, and the Senator from Pennsylvania and myself can not agree upon that proposition. It is with the greatest deference that I say my views do not agree with his views on that subject, and I will give my reasons in answer to the Senator's question. If you go into a court of original jurisdiction in the assertion of a constitutional right, you can not deprive the suitor of a constitutional incident. I will admit that proposition. If you go into a court of equity having a right to try a constitutional question, you can not deprive that court of the right to keep the property in statu quo until the question is determined. That is not this case. If I go into court and ask the court to enjoin a railroad company from tearing my house down before it has paid me the condemnation money or before it tendered me anything, that is a court of original jurisdiction, and undoubtedly the court will keep the property in statu quo until that question is determined. A court will not permit the railroad company to tear my property down, and find, when it comes to decide the question, that there is no property there. I have the decision in the case that I brought myself of the Western Union Telegraph Company in the Maryland circuit, which closes that subject. I will give the case. It is very interesting. The Pennsylvania Railroad undertook to tear down the poles of the Western Union Telegraph Company, and while the case was pending we enjoined them in the Maryland circuit. The Pennsylvania circuit permitted the Pennsylvania Railroad to tear the poles down and the New Jersey circuit was about to do the same thing, when the Supreme Court stopped it by an order. I have not time to refer to it. I have it among my papers. It is in the eighteenth transcript of the unreported cases, page 143. The circuit court of appeals of New Jersey, as I recollect, declined to stop them from tearing down the property while the case was pending. It came up in Chambers, and Mr. Justice Peckham signed the order keeping the property in statu quo; and I believe that is the law.

That is not this case. Here you have a vital distinction. Here you have a legal adjudication against the carrier. You have a body constituted by law, constitutionally constituted, with adequate jurisdiction fixing that rate. The carrier has had his trial before that body, and he is not entitled on appeal and on successive appeals to keep the property in statu quo until the final adjudication.

The Senator from Pennsylvania asks me to find a case. I give him the case in 8 Howard. I give him the case I think I gave him yesterday. I will give it to him again—in 14 Wallace and in 147 United States. The Senator from Pennsylvania does not think those cases reach the point that I am arguing.

Mr. KNOX. I have examined those cases with a great deal of care, and I do not want the Senator to understand that my suggestion was combative at all.

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly not.

Mr. KNOX. It was merely to elicit information, which, I think, we are conscientiously trying to find. I have examined those cases, and in my judgment they are not authorities for the proposition for which the Senator is contending. Those cases are purely cases of jurisdiction, and, in my mind at least, the distinction is very clear between giving the court the right to speak in a case, the right to decide a case, and saying to the court how it shall decide the case.

Mr. RAYNER. There is no one Senator whose legal opinion I respect more than that of the Senator from Pennsylvania. The Senator is one in the foremost rank of the leaders of the American bar. When the Senator told me he did not think these cases carried with them the point for which I was contending I gave them a much closer examination, and I regret to say that I can not possibly agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania. I know his views. I know his bill. The Senator has a bill that is not perhaps objectionable. The Senator's bill is almost the least objectionable that has been presented in this body. But the point I make is that the carriers had a trial. The carriers had a trial before the Commission, a legally constituted Commission, in the language of Judge Brewer; and the Commission's judgment has been against the carrier. Now, where is there any law that gives any man the right to the protection of his property in a case of appeal or review? I would ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to find me cases the other way. I obtain a judgment against the defendant. The defendant takes an appeal. Where is there any law that tells the court you must prevent execution of that judgment until the defendant is heard on appeal? They make the defendant give a bond, and if the defendant can not give a bond his property is executed upon and his property is gone when he ends his case in the appellate tribunal.

The philosophy of the law is that the suitor has had a trial in a court of competent jurisdiction. I say the carrier has had a trial before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Interstate Commerce Commission has decided the case against him. The property has remained intact until that decision. Now he comes into court and says to the circuit court, "You must protect my challenged rate while I am in the circuit court." Then he goes to the circuit court of appeals and says, "You must protect my challenged rate while I am in the circuit court." Then he goes, as they did in this case, to the Supreme Court of the United States, and says, "You must protect us there;" and then the three years are out and the shipper never gets the reduced rate.

I say there is no case which says that the court shall have the constitutional right to sign interlocutory decrees and suspending orders upon appeal—"review" we will call it.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. RAYNER. Cheerfully.

Mr. KNOX. I want to say again, and I am sure the Senator does not misunderstand me, I am not arguing or even suggesting anything along the line of the policy of suspending or not suspending these orders pending a decision of the court. I am trying to get at it just in the same way the Senator from Maryland so eloquently described in the opening of his discussion here to-day, as a lawyer; and I am asking in the most perfect good faith for purposes of my own information as well as for others who are seeking information upon this line. I want to know if there is any case which decides the proposition which I put to the Senator a moment ago?

Now, I comprehend his answer, but it seems to me that his answer is predicated upon the proposition that the proceeding begun in the circuit court of the United States is an appeal, and the proceeding in the circuit court of the United States is not an appeal. It is an original proceeding. If it were not an original proceeding, you could not get into the court to get redress from the action of the administrative body.

Mr. RAYNER. I am sorry that I can not accept the view that the appeal to the circuit court is an original proceeding. I can not possibly accept that view, because while it is not an appeal the Supreme Court in the Dawes and Duall Interference cases, with both of which cases my friend and myself are conversant, having held technically that you could not take an appeal but could have a review; but I can never accept the proposition that a case once tried by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Interstate Commerce Commission acting on it, a bill in the circuit court is not a bill of review. That is what causes me trouble. It is not original.

Mr. KNOX. I want to relieve the Senator from trouble if he will allow me just a moment. I will take great pleasure in handing him—I can not do it to-night—a reference to the case in one of the Howards, where it was specifically decided that where the land commission appointed to settle titles in California, and suitors were by act of Congress given an appeal to the district court in terms. When the case got into the Supreme Court of the United States they discovered the word "appeal," and said: "We will entertain jurisdiction here, because, in fact, this was an original proceeding; otherwise no appeal would lie from the decision of the land commission." I do not know but what I have already handed it to the Senator.

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator has given me the case, and I have examined it very carefully. They drew a distinction between a review and an appeal, and it was rather a technical distinction. I do not think the Senator from Pennsylvania, before he examined the decisions, was fully aware of that distinction. I never was. It is a very technical distinction that you can obtain a review from an administrative body, but you can not appeal. That was an early case in the court.

Mr. KNOX. I beg the Senator's pardon, but they did not say you could have a review. They said it was in the nature of an original proceeding, and it is only a review in a broader sense.

Mr. RAYNER. And in the subsequent case—the Dawes case—the case I gave the Senator, in 174 United States, and in the Interference cases, in 172 United States, they used the word "review," with no distinction between an original bill and a bill of review.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from Pennsylvania doubtless referred to the case of the United States against Ritchie, which is 17 Howard.

Mr. KNOX. That is the case.

Mr. HEYBURN. Not attempting to elaborate the Senator's presentation of it, I should like to put in the RECORD what the court said upon that question. It is only a few lines, and it illuminates the question. The court said:

> The transfer, it is true—

That is, from the board of land commissioners to the circuit court—> is called an appeal; we must not, however, be misled by a name, but look to the substance and intent of the proceeding. The district court is not confined to a mere reexamination of the case as heard and decided by the board of commissioners, but hears the case de novo, upon the papers and testimony which had been used before the board, they being made evidence in the district court, and also upon such further evidence as either party may see fit to produce.

That case certainly marks the distinction between a review of an administrative board by a court and an original proceeding in the circuit court, because it is held in the case of Keim against the United States, in 177 U. S., page 293, that the court can not review the proceedings of an administrative board of the Government in the nature of an appeal.

Mr. RAYNER. That is the case that the Senator from Pennsylvania gave me.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Maryland permit me one short question?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am very glad to find myself in substantial accord with the views of the Senator from Maryland, as I unstand them, on the right of review by the courts upon the question of just compensation. I should like to ask him whether he is willing or expects to vote for a proposition which will give the shipper equvalent rights for review of rates that may be fixed by the Commission which were extortionate or unreasonable?

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from Rhode Island will agree with me. I wish he would; but I do not think he will. I am perfectly willing to put these words in the bill:

> That the court shall have jurisdiction in all cases where the Interstate Commerce Commission has passed an order that does not allow just compensation.

I want to follow the constitutional words.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is for the carriers. Now, if the shippers——

Mr. RAYNER. I am not willing to go one word beyond those words. I want it just in those words.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is the Senator willing to give the shippers relief in cases of extortionate rates fixed by the Commission itself?

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator means in a case where the Commission has fixed the rates too high?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes.

Mr. RAYNER. I am——

Mr. ALDRICH. Then I find myself practically in accord with the Senator from Maryland, and I feel as to this contention there ought to be unanimous consent, as there seems to be no difference amongst Senators.

Mr. RAYNER. Is the Senator from Rhode Island willing that the court shall have no jurisdiction beyond the question of just compensation, excluding the words "unreasonably or unjustly low," but that the sole jurisdiction of the Federal courts shall be to try the question of just compensation?

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not now undertaking to say what phraseology I would consent to.

Mr. RAYNER. But I am.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think not. I think the Senator has not his amendment in such form as he would be willing to do that.

Mr. RAYNER. Yes; I have.

Mr. ALDRICH. I thought the Senator was laying down certain general principles.

Mr. RAYNER. No.

Mr. ALDRICH. I can not very well answer the Senator's question until I can see the amendment and read it.

Mr. RAYNER. There will be an amendment saying that the court shall have the right to try the question of just compensation. I am only speaking for myself.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am only speaking for myself.

Mr. RAYNER. I have not the right to bind anyone on this side of the Chamber; but I will say that there is an amendment being looked into which absolutely does away with this suspending order. I am quite satisfied that the Senator will not agree to that proposition which gives the court the right to try the question of unjust compensation without suspending orders. The amendment constitutes the circuit court the tribunal that is to determine the question of just compensation, and strikes down the suspending order. If the Senator can get a unanimous vote on that, he can pass the bill this afternoon.

Mr. ALDRICH. Any provision that gives the shipper and carrier the right to go before the court and have the question as to the reasonableness or unreasonableness of rates determined by the court meets with my approval, and I believe will receive practically the unanimous vote of the Senate.

As to the question of the suspending order, I do not care to go into that at present.

Mr. RAYNER. That is the vital point, and that will be the test vote in this Senate. The question will be between those who are in favor of the suspending order and those who are against it. I am dead against it, and I do not expect to vote for any bill that gives to the court a right unqualifiedly to suspend these orders. I would not give the court at any step the right to do that.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Maryland is assuming a great deal, I think, in saying that he thinks that that is the point at which the division is going to take place. He certainly is assuming that this side or the other side of the Chamber have opinions which have not yet been expressed. I certainly do not want to vote for a proposition that means indefinite extension and endless litigation in this matter. I believe that all parties ought to have an opportunity to be heard and have the case promptly determined.

Mr. RAYNER. Let me ask the Senator a question, and we will settle that whole thing right here.

Mr. ALDRICH. I thought we had reached an agreement.

Mr. RAYNER. Will the Senator vote even for an amendment striking from the bill the words "suspending order?"

Mr. ALDRICH. I would want to see in what connection the words were which were to be stricken out, and what was to be inserted in place of them.

Mr. RAYNER. Let me give the connection.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not think the Senator expects that he and I will be able here to agree upon the phraseology. I am trying to agree with the Senator, so far as I can, upon the principles which shall govern our action.

Mr. RAYNER. I understand that you have engaged to do this.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Maryland is engaging in an effort apparently to show that I must disagree with him.

Mr. RAYNER. Not at all.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. RAYNER. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KNOX. I only want to ask if the apparent difference between the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] is not premature? You are undertaking now to provide that the court shall not suspend the order, and you have not agreed with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] that there is to be a court.

Mr. RAYNER. That is another matter. The Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from Pennsylvania disagree with the Senator from Iowa upon that proposition absolutely.

Mr. KNOX. I stated that there ought to be a court provided. I think that is really the only difference between the Senator from Iowa and myself, barring one or two little details, which have not been referred to. I think he and I could agree on this question of court review. As I understand, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] made a similar statement the other day during his speech on the floor of the Senate, and Mr. HEPBURN made the same statement on the floor of the House on the day the bill was passed, which is that they recognize the power of the circuit court to entertain suits to set aside the orders of the Commission; that they recognize that that power is an unrestricted power. Now, I say the only difference between them and myself is—and my views are set out in the fifth section of the bill I offered—that I agree that the court has power, but I am in favor of restricting that power in the interest of the public by requiring either a cash deposit or the deposit of a bond so as to prevent frivolous appeals to the court.

Mr. RAYNER. I do not think that a bond could be made that could be sued on. I understand the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] is considering an amendment of that kind to this bill for the deposit of money. Let us take the case of a bond. Who can sue on that bond? The shipper can not sue on it, because he has his freight back from the consignee. The consignee can not sue on it, because he has his freight back in the price to the consumer. It is what is known in law as an absolutely nonsueable bond.

I am rather fortunate here this afternoon. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] and myself agree upon a good many points; the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] and myself agree entirely; the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] and myself seem to agree upon a point, and the only one who does not agree with anyone here is the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER]. [Laughter.]

What I want is this: I will, when the time comes, in a very modest way, if some one else does not do it, propose an amendment, though I should prefer that some one else should do it—at any rate it will be done by Senators in charge of this bill, for I am not on the committee. I call attention to this provision of the bill:

Such order shall go into effect thirty days after notice to the carrier and shall remain in force and be observed by the carrier, unless the same shall be suspended or modified or set aside by the Commission—

I have no objection to that. The bill continues:

or be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction.

I will offer an amendment against suspending orders.

If the Senator from Rhode Island, after thinking over the matter and upon reflection, will agree to strike out these suspending orders, prohibiting the courts from passing any interlocutory orders, and then gives us a naked principle, unjust compensation within the meaning of the Constitution, I do not think there will be much difficulty in passing a bill through, whether you put a court in it or not. I had rather have a court put in. Of course, I agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania on that.

Now, Mr. President, I have stated my position. I shall vote for the Hepburn bill if I can not do any better. I have an amendment to the Hepburn bill providing that the court shall try the question of unjust compensation and nothing else, and not try the confiscatory question. I think that is against the railroads. I think that is a perfectly unmeaning phrase. Then I will vote for an amendment against the suspending order and have the courts try the question as to unjust compensation and nothing else. Then I will vote for the bill.

Mr. President, I want to say that the question here before us is a grave question. I am inclined to think that there will be an insistence—I do not know on the part of whom; I certainly do not mean to individualize—but there will be an insistence in some direction on keeping in this bill these suspending orders in some way or other—the deposit of money or the giving of a bond—to put the suspending order in. There is where the conflict is coming; there is where we shall be severed—on the suspension of these orders being put into this bill.

I have come to the conclusion that, if you suspend these orders temporarily, you suspend them finally; you suspend them during the whole three years, and that the shipper will have to make his fight all over again, and then they will be suspended for three years more. That is the vital point of the bill which has given trouble to those of us who have examined it.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. May I say, for the Senator's information, that he has overlooked the fact that the language in the bill to which he called attention earlier, and has frequently repeated, does not mean a delay of three years. In the Fifty-seventh Congress a law was passed which, I hope I may say without any vanity, I had suggested to Congress, and had also prepared, providing that in all cases arising under the antitrust act—and I think you, Mr. President [the Vice-President in the chair], presented the bill in the Senate—the Attorney-General should certify to the circuit judges the importance of the case, whereupon it was made the duty of all the circuit judges to at once sit and hear that case with the utmost expedition, and from their decree an appeal lay to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Under the provisions of the so-called "Elkins law," that expedition act was extended to all cases arising under the interstate-commerce act. Under the provisions of the bill which we are now considering it is made the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States to so certify the circuit court in every case arising under it.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, how long does the Senator from Pennsylvania think it would take to get a case through, starting with the Interstate Commerce Commission, getting it through the Interstate Commerce Commission, then through the circuit court, then through the circuit court of appeals, and finally through the Supreme Court of the United States—how long?

Mr. KNOX. To answer the Senator's question, I would say he must not start when the case gets into the Interstate Commerce Commission, but he must start when it gets out of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. RAYNER. I start when we get it into the Commission.

Mr. KNOX. That question does not arise here.

Mr. RAYNER. Well, leave that out.

Mr. KNOX. I am not here contending that the Interstate Commerce Commission moves with remarkable celerity. I do not think, however, that that question is involved here.

Mr. RAYNER. Well, leave that out.

Mr. KNOX. Your allegation is that if you allow the courts to pass upon these orders you will be three years in court. My answer to that proposition is that if the Attorney-General of the United States does his duty, as he is required to do by this statute if this bill should become a law, he will certify those cases to the circuit court under the expedition act, and they ought to be disposed of inside of sixty days.

Mr. RAYNER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania mean to say that he can get a case tried in sixty days in the circuit court, in the circuit court of appeals, and in the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. KNOX. There is not any appeal to the circuit court of appeals under this proposed act. It is an appeal directly from the circuit court to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. RAYNER. Under this act?

Mr. KNOX. Under the Hepburn bill, under the expedition act, under the interstate-commerce act, and under the antitrust act.

Mr. RAYNER. How long would it take to try a case? The carrier, if it desires, can appeal to the circuit court of appeals.

Mr. KNOX. I tell you it took us about thirty days to get the Northern Securities case into the circuit court.

Mr. RAYNER. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania has had much better fortune than I have had if he has been able to get a case of that sort finished in sixty days, six months, or a year and a half. Even if the circuit court had advanced the case the carrier would have the right to issue subpœnas to witnesses, to take testimony, and the whole case would have to be gone over de novo and the witnesses summoned. The Senator certainly does not think a case can be rushed through the circuit court in sixty days or through the Supreme Court, does he?

Mr. TILLMAN rose.

Mr. RAYNER. I will ask the Senator from South Carolina if he thinks such a case could be rushed through in that time?

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] if his conception of the facility and expedition that will obtain in these suits is true, where would any great harm come to the railroads? Suppose an order of the Commission is erroneous; suppose it is a robbery of the railroad; will they be very badly hurt in sixty or ninety days?

Mr. KNOX. I think not.

Mr. TILLMAN. Therefore, why should we worry so much about them and not worry about the people?

Mr. KNOX. I do not think you ought to worry about them. I am not. I think it minimizes the danger to the railroads and also expedites the relief to the people to have prompt decisions.

Mr. TILLMAN. As an illustration we have the cases from Titusville, Pa., involving lawsuits between the oil producers and Pennsylvania railroads—I think the Pennsylvania Railroad proper—which have been going on for seventeen years; and the litigants—that is, the producers of oil—have been pleading and begging and litigating until some of them have died while trying to get relief.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I would like to state for the information of the Senator from South Carolina that I received word a few days ago from the judge of the United States district court in Pittsburg, where that litigation was pending for so many years. He felt, of course, just a little hurt at the reflection that was made here in the Senate upon the slowness of the motions of that court. He stated that the complainants in that case had failed to make a move in the litigation for pretty nearly two years.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should think they would get tired after fifteen years. I should get tired before five years, I should think. [Laughter.]

Mr. KNOX. They were in the court, I think, less than five years, but they were in the court before the Commission for the full length of time the Senator from South Carolina has stated, as I understand.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. Before we——

Mr. RAYNER. I should like to conclude now.

Mr. FORAKER. Before we get away from this point——

Mr. RAYNER. I should like very much to get away from it.

Mr. TILLMAN (to Mr. RAYNER). You are doing too well to get away from it. Let them go on.

Mr. FORAKER. We are all very much indebted to the Senator from Maryland. He has enlightened us and entertained us.

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator from Iowa does not think I have enlightened him.

Mr. FORAKER. We all think the Senator has enlightened and entertained us.

What I desire to call attention to is the fact that we are not without illustrations of the relative progress that can be made before the Interstate Commerce Commission and in the courts. On December 20 last I put into the RECORD the decision and the record of the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission against numerous railways running into Chicago in what is known as the "Dressed Meat and Packing-House Products case." It appeared from that record that that case was pending almost three years, I believe, before the Interstate Commerce Commission. After they had decided it and made an order, and the railroads refused to comply with the order, the Interstate Commerce Commission brought suit in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Illinois on the 17th day of July, 1905. All the testimony that was taken before the Interstate Commerce Commission was retaken, a great deal of additional testimony was taken, and the final decision and decree were entered by the court, Judge Bethea, on the 20th day of November, 1905, I believe—that was only four months—and the whole case was gone over thoroughly, completely, and satisfactorily.

In the Chesapeake and Ohio and New Haven Coal case, decided only a few days ago by the Supreme Court of the United States, we have another illustration of the expedition with which these matters can be prosecuted in the courts. There the proceeding was commenced by filing a complaint before the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Interstate Commerce Commission referred it to the court under the Elkins law. I call particular attention to this because I intend to speak in a few days when I can get an opportunity and insist that if Senators want to find a remedy for the evils complained of they will find it by amending the Elkins law, and they will find it in no other way. The Interstate Commerce Commission referred that case to the court, and by amending that law all these cases would be referred to the court. That case was heard in the circuit court and, a temporary restraining order being granted immediately upon the filing of the bill, it continued until the final judgment was rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States a few weeks ago. So that the complainant had full relief from the very moment he commenced his proceeding. That proceeding was commenced before the Commission in April, 1903; passed through the Commission, they expediting it in the way indicated, and as I want to require them to expedite all such cases; it passed through the circuit court, passed through the circuit court of appeals, passed through the Supreme Court, and has passed into final judgment, all parties being granted relief not only in that case, but a great principle being finally and satisfactorily settled by the Supreme Court in that decision, namely, that common carriers shall be restricted to the business of common carriers, and shall not be allowed to acquire coal lands, engage as coal operators, and go into the business of marketing, selling, and transporting coal in competition with those who are engaged legitimately in the business.

Mr. President, there are two illustrations of how progress can be made in the court far beyond any progress that can be made before any commission, and the Senator appreciates why that is. Before the Commission, the statute says——

Mr. RAYNER. I yielded to the Senator for a question, and I think I have yielded very frequently to-day. I shall be very much obliged to the Senator if he will just let me finish what I have to say.

Mr. FORAKER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. RAYNER. I should like to finish.

Mr. FORAKER. I beg pardon; I did not know I was intruding.

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator was not intruding, but I should like to complete my remarks.

Mr. FORAKER. I shall yield at once, with an apology to the Senator.

Mr. RAYNER. Not at all. The Senator never says anything that does not enlighten and interest me. I am always instructed by what the Senator says.

Mr. FORAKER. I am glad I was able to include the cases to which I referred.

Mr. RAYNER. I am on another branch of this discussion now. I want to conclude, because there is a limit to all things.

THE RAILROAD TABLE.

One of the Interstate Commerce Commissioners, in several addresses that he has from time to time delivered at various places, has irreverently spoken of four or five gentlemen who can sit around a table in New York and dictate railroad rates throughout the entire country. I do not suppose it is revealing any secret to refer to the gentlemen who can thus sit around this table and make it respond wtih spiritualistic accuracy to their suggestions. I will admit, in response to the fervent appeals of their counsel—I am talking now about the counsel who have appeared before the committee—Mr. Morawetz, of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe; Mr. Bond, from my own State, of the Baltimore and Ohio; Mr. Hines, of the Atlantic Coast Line, who I think is a very brilliant man, who has given us more information on this subject than perhaps any other; Mr. Mather, of the Rock Island; and Mr. Peck, of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul—I will admit, in response to their fervent appeals, that it would be a great pity to destroy the equilibrium or the proper balance of Messrs. Vanderbilt, Morgan, Gould, and Harriman.

Things are in such fine shape around this table that it would be a shame for any uninvited guest to break into the harmony of the scene and turn it into a Belshazzar's feast. We must not suppose that these gentlemen are indulging in any luxuries as they are sitting around this table. They are not regaling themselves in midwinter with tropical fruit from Florida groves or California vineyards, transported in the Armour Company's refrigerator cars; on the contrary, their meal is a very frugal one. They have been hard-working individuals during all of their lives, and now, after years of incessant toil and labor, at the moment when they have acquired a bare competency and are earning a fair amount of wages to keep themselves and their dependent families from want and destitution, it is a heartless and a cruel deed, I know, to unsettle their equilibrium or to deprive them of their hard-earned savings. It was sad enough, anyway, this whole scene as it presented itself to the committee. Here were the counsel of the railroads, whom I have named, all arrayed in their mourning weeds with their long, funereal briefs exhorting the committee not to take any step that would bring havoc and ruin upon their clients who have already made so many sacrifices of unselfish devotion to the interests of the public. The calamities that are in store for us as portrayed by these eminent members of the profession are something too dreadful to contemplate with composure. Joseph never prophesied the plagues of Egypt with the accuracy and precision that this formidable body of soothsayers announce the terrible succession of catastrophies that are to overtake us if we should determine upon this apparently innocent legislation, and Jeremiah never wept over the afflictions of Jerusalem with the passionate and consuming emotions that agitated their bosoms as they poured their lamentations into the ears of the distinguished chairman of the committee, who tried upon many an occasion to condole with them in their misfortunes and assuage them in the exuberant profusion of their grief.

Mr. President, sympathizing with these afflicted millionaires in the hour of their bereavement, commending to them the example of that ancestral and distinguished member of their tribe, the richest man in all the East, who, when the Chaldeans and the Sabeans fell upon his camels and sheep and oxen, proclaimed: "Naked came I into the world; naked shall I leave it." I can not help feeling, as I look upon the Senators from Ohio and Rhode Island and regard their cheerful countenances during all this trying ordeal, that they realize, just as I do, we are in the same category; that when the agony is over and we have promulgated this inhuman ordinance, the Lord will again come to the relief of Messrs. Vanderbilt and Morgan and Gould and Harriman and double their possessions as He did unto His servant Job in the land of Uz.

I want to read a short extract, only a few lines, from the first and last chapters of the book of Job, which may afford us some consolation in this trying hour. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland will suspend while the Chair admonishes the galleries that under the rules of the Senate they must refrain from any demonstration.

Mr. RAYNER. I read a few lines from the first chapter of the Book of Job and from the last chapter (paraphrased), which I think meet the situation:

This man was the richest man in all the East, but the Sabeans fell upon his oxen and asses, and the Chaldeans fell upon his camels, and the winds from the wilderness smote the four corners of his house.

This is from the last chapter of the Book of Job (ch. 42):

And the Lord turned the captivity of Job and his acquaintances; every man of them brought him pieces of money and earrings of gold, and the Lord doubled the possessions of Job and gave him fourteen thousand sheep, six thousand camels, a thousand yoke of oxen, and a thousand she asses, twice as much as he had before.

DISCRIMINATION IS THE ISSUE.

I want to be and must be entirely understood upon the matter of discrimination that I have talked about. I am not condemning these rates from the standpoint of the railroads or contending for a moment that the entire system can be or ought to be changed. I am looking at the subject strictly from a practical standpoint. Competition by rail and by water will continually drive down the rates of freight between terminal points, and a strictly distance standard would be absolutely ruinous to the railroad interests and to the competitive markets of the country. We can all easily understand how a railroad can be compelled to carry freight for a loss for a long distance where there is competition, and then be compelled to keep up its rates to the maximum figure where there is no competition.

When the Supreme Court of the United States in the long and short haul cases announced that the existence of bona fide competition between competing carriers was a factor which rendered conditions of shipment substantially dissimilar, it simply stated a proposition that was essential for the preservation of railroad property in the United States from confiscation.

When experts and railroad presidents and traffic managers tell us that a charge on a low grade to the Gulf ports, with returning cars loaded with freight, must be more reasonable than for distances over the mountains to the Atlantic seaports, we all concede that they are stating a proposition that no one would contradict unless he was in a benighted state of ignorance as to railroad conditions. What we require is a little common sense upon this subject. We can not pass a law that will convert the towns and hamlets of Iowa immediately into great manufacturing centers, nor frame a statute for the special benefit of a grain shipper in the city of Milwaukee; but what we can do is to take a broad view of the whole field and ascertain if we can not endow a tribunal with adequate power whenever cases occur where unnecessary discrimination is practiced to apply a remedy without inflicting any injury upon the railroad. Let me give you a homely, but at the same time a pointed, illustration from Mr. Kernan, the same witness whom I have already referred to, upon this branch of the discussion. His testimony is as follows:

For instance, you take the question of two farmers living 100 miles from Chicago, one on one railroad and one on another. They are both competitors for the foreign and domestic markets. They are on different lines and those lines are in different States. Now, the farmer at one point is charged for carrying grain to Chicago 3 cents a bushel. The farmer on the other road is charged 1½ cents a bushel. Now, that difference of 1½ cents a bushel, you see, wipes out to a certain extent the business of the farmer who has to pay 3 cents. You can not deal with that situation any way except through the Interstate Commerce Commission, which can bring both of these rates before it and enter into a consideration of these relative rates and fix them in the proper relations toward each other. It may be that the interests of one road and the form of business of one road may permit a higher rate. If that is so it will have to stand; but it may be that of these rates one is higher and the other lower than it ought to be. Those things have to be met by the power of somebody who has power to fix relative rates, and it is relative rates in this country that are troublesome.

This is a concise and forcible statement of the situation, although the present bill does not relieve it. It does not follow that the rate shall always be established upon an exact degree of equality, and it does not follow that where one shipper is at a terminal point where competition exists and another shipper is at an inland point where there is no competition that the Commission must apply the distance rate and place them both upon an equality according to the amount of mileage from the original point of shipment. What the Commission will do is not to exercise an arbitrary power and establish rates regardless of the circumstances that control the situation, but they will bring into play the power of comparison and adjustment, governed and controlled by all the circumstances that surround it, and especially subject to the rules and interpretation that the Supreme Court has given to the third and fourth sections of the existing act.

THE DEFECTS OF THE PRESENT SYSTEM.

Now, as to the defect of the present system and the legislation that is necessary to rectify it. The Interstate Commerce Commission is the most anomalous body ever created by law. It is a body that possesses no power to pass any order or decree over the most important subject within its jurisdiction. It can declare a rate to be unreasonable, but it has no authority to substitute a reasonable rate in its place. It has the right to decide that a given rate constitutes an unlawful discrimination, but it is not empowered to establish a lawful rate in its stead. If there is a dollar rate, for instance, between New York and Chicago, it can decide that the dollar rate is unreasonable and enjoin its continuance in court; but neither the Commission nor the court can declare any other rate to be reasonable and compel its acceptance by the railroad.

It can suggest that a rate of 80 cents would be a proper charge in the premises, and the court can coincide with its views; but neither the Commission nor the court can enforce the 80-cent rate or command compliance with its decree. If it sets aside the dollar rate and comes to the conclusion that the 80-cent rate is the proper charge, the railroad need not pay the slightest attention to its judgment, but can change the rate to 95 cents and ignore the decision. This is the law, and so in the maximum-rate cases the Supreme Court has interpreted it. For ten years, from 1887 to 1897, the Commission thought otherwise, and when it declared a rate unreasonable proceeded to establish another rate in its place; but when the cases came to the Supreme Court it held that its functions had ceased as soon as it declared a rate unreasonable, and that when it proceeded to determine what the rate ought to be it was functus officii. In other words, when a shipper makes complaint to the Commission and the Commission decides in his favor and the court sustains the Commission, the railroad has a right to say whether it will submit to the decision against it or whether it will challenge and defy it; and if it does submit it will be by its voluntary acquiescence and not by force of any judgment that may have been rendered against it. Is there such another tribunal upon the face of the civilized earth? Created for a certain purpose, but stripped and divested of every function, power, and process that are necessary to accomplish the object of its creation. Shall we stand still now and prolong its impotence and sullenly refuse to invest it with the power to put its decree into practical execution, or shall we inspire it with life and place in its hands the only effective instrument that can accomplish the purpose for which it exists?

That instrument is the rate-making power. We may scheme and forge and fashion, but it is not within the realm of human ingenuity to formulate any plan except the rate-making power that will remedy the defect and supply the omission. Railroad experts, railroad presidents, and counsel and traffic managers have all been importuned by the committee to devise some other method by which a practical result could be reached, but not a single one of them has any invention whatever to meet the emergency. The emergency must be met; the issue must be faced, and we must invest either a commission or the courts with an effective weapon to maintain their dignity and compel obedience to their mandates, or else tear down the whole infirm and feeble structure and let the railroads drive in triump over its ruins.

THERE IS NO RIGHT TO INITIATE RATES.

We now come to some other objections to this legislation. It is claimed that under this legislation the Interstate Commerce Commission will have the right to initiate or revise every railroad rate in the United States and establish mere motu a new system of rates for the entire country. If I was not somewhat familiar with the vein of humor that railroad counsel indulge in upon an occasion of this sort, when they hold court with innocent members of legislative bodies, I might be tempted to regard this protest with a serious aspect, because I am quite sure that in the seclusion of their own reflections they themselves regard it with ridicule and derision.

The House enactment provides in explicit terms that no step of this sort whatever can be taken by the Interstate Commerce Commission except upon complaint. It limits and qualifies the provisions of section 13 of the original act, and places an absolute prohibition upon the Interstate Commerce Commission from undertaking this sort of a proceeding upon their own volition. Therefore, when eminent counsel state a proposition of this sort, in view of the unambiguous language of the act, they might as well tell me that the courts of every State would have the right to take up every contract and every transfer of property that is recorded in every registration office and every tort that is committed within their knowledge against any individual in the land, and of their own volition, without complaint, plea, or prosecution, and adjudicate and pronounce judgment upon it. It never was intended to confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission any such power, and its limitation was expressly agreed upon in the early stages of the discussion.' Judge Clements, the chairman of the committee for railway legislation, at a convention of the National Association of Railway Commissioners held in November, 1904, then disposed of this fallacy in the following language:

That there shall be no misconception it should be again stated that the present public demand is not that the Federal Commission shall fix a low tariff of rates in the first instance, or at any time, but simply that when a rate is complained of by a shipper or community and shown to be excessive the Commission shall have authority to prescribe the reasonable rate indicated by the evidence in the particular case.

Mr. Bacon, who is claimed to be the apostle of this agitation and the commander in chief of the entire crusade—and whatever may be the motives that inspire him he is undoubtedly a man of thought and capacity—thus disposes of the contention:

I should say if they were to undertake to fix all the rates of the country as it has been given out by the railway interests that they are expected to do that it would be utterly impracticable. It would be utterly impossible for a commission sitting in Washington, or sitting in any central part of the country, to fix rates for all parts of the country. It would be an absurdity, in my opinion, for any body of men to attempt it. All that we seek is that when the rates are believed by certain individuals interested in them to be wrong these particular rates shall be brought to the attention of this particular body—you may call it a commission or whatever else you please.

CORRELATED RATES.

The next objection is that the right to establish one rate would carry with it every correlated rate and would eventually extend to all the rates on every railroad. The Senator from Minnesota [Senator CLAPP] has so fully covered that point that I read you an extract from his examination of Mr. Hiland, which demonstrates that precisely the same objection that is now made against the present proposition applies to the system that is now in vogue:

Senator CLAPP. In other words, the objection to the fixing of rates, so far as it involves the adjustment of other rates, and the continued fixing rates by the Commission, so far as those two principles are involved, apply with equal force to the existing law as to a law which went a step further and allowed the Commision in condemning one rate to prescribe a rate in lieu thereof.

Mr. HILAND. I presume that is so.

DIFFERENTIALS.

The next objection to the rate-making power is one that applies to the subject of differentials under the constitutional provision that no preference shall be given to the ports of one State over those of another.

I desire to make a distinction now which is necessary in order to fully understand this objection. The phrases discrimination and differentials have been confused, and they have both been employed as applicable to the same conditions. Nearly every witness has spoken of them indiscriminately as if they conveyed the same meaning. I have as eminent an authority as Professor Cooley for the statement that technically speaking discrimination means an advantage given to certain shippers and localities over other shippers and localities upon the same road, while the differential is applied not to the difference between the several classes of freight upon one road but to the difference in rates made by different railroads between points of shipment and ports of entry upon their respective lines.

In my professional experience I have never beheld such a disturbance as has taken place upon the simple proposition that is here involved. Counsel proceeded so far that one of the most distinguished leaders of the American bar declared to the committee that he had no doubt whatever that if the Commission were vested with the rate-making power, and attempted to preserve existing differentials or to establish new ones, it would find itself face to face with the preference clause of the Constitution; that is to say, if the Commission touches the differentials at any point whatever, or failing to touch them permits them to remain as established by the railroads, in either event it violates the Constitution of the United States, and this, notwithstanding the fact that more than half a century ago, in the Wheeling and Bolman Bridge Company case (18 Howard), the Supreme Court with unanimity declared that legislation of this character did not at all come within the purview of the Constitution, and that this clause of the Constitution had no possible reference to any incidental advantages that might result to the ports of one State over those of another from legislation of this character.

The most painful feature about this performance of counsel, however, is that this present enactment, entirely ignoring the provisions of the Esch-Townsend bill in the last Congress, rejecting the recommendations of the Interstate Commerce Commission and disregarding the original recommendations of the President, absolutely deprives the Commission from fixing or establishing minimum rates, and, therefore, unless it exercises an arbitrary power by lowering a perfectly reasonable rate, it gives it no jurisdiction whatever over differentials and no power to control the rates to competitive markets. In other words, it confines its jurisdiction to the rates upon a single railroad and gives it control inefficient though it be over discrimination upon that road, but does not confer upon it the right to adjust competitive rates upon competitive roads. The Commission must find that the carrier is charging unjust or unreasonable or unjustly discriminating or preferential rates, and in such cases of discrimination by the carrier it can fix a maximum rate, but that is the limit of its jurisdiction.

I know that it is claimed that this bill confers the right upon the Commission to adjust differentials. I say that it gives the Commission no such power. Every member of the committee in the House of Representatives has emphatically denied that there was any intention to incorporate any such grant in the bill, and there is nothing whatever in the bill that admits of such a construction. It is impossible to fix differentials unless the power was given to fix rates. The right to fix maximum rates does not carry the power. In order to reach differentials it was necessary that the bill should contain a provision that minimum rates could be established, or else a provision conferring upon the Commission the right to adjust relative rates. The fixing of a maximum rate does not answer the purpose. Let me illustrate this proposition. Suppose a rate upon one railroad was a dollar, and the rate upon another railroad was 75 cents, and the Commission lowered the dollar rate to 75 cents. The other railroad in such case could immediately lower its 75-cent rate to 50 cents, and thus maintain the differential. I know that it has been claimed that section 15, when it uses the phraseology "of unjustly discriminating or unduly preferential rates, or otherwise, in violation of any of the provisions of this act," and then proceeds to give the Commission the right to order the railroad "to cease and desist from such violation," that this gives the Commission the power to control the differential.

I can not coincide with this view, and I deny that upon any construction that can be put upon this language there is any power whatever in the Commission to adjust relative rates and strike the proper proportions between them. The ports of the United States, therefore, are not within the jurisdiction of the Hepburn Act. If there is a differential between different ports upon different lines of railroads, there is no provision of this measure that invests the Commission with the right to change it. It has a perfect right, of course, where discrimination exists upon the same line, as if a rate to an inland point compared with a rate to a terminal point is unreasonable or unjustly discriminatory, to prescribe a maximum rate; but it has no right to bring competitive roads struggling for competitive markets within its jurisdiction, and I deny in its entirety the proposition that the Commission could by any exercise of its power, direct or inferential, take away from any railroad its right to charge its own rates, unless the rate is unreasonable or unduly preferential or discriminatory upon its own line.

THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION IS NOW PRACTICALLY FIXING RATES.

There is, however, one feature connected with the administration of the Interstate Commerce Commission that is of the utmost importance in this discussion, and that is that according to the evidence of its bitterest opponents and according to the statement of every witness who is now opposing its investiture with the ratemaking power it has, notwithstanding the decisions of the Supreme Court, with but very few exceptions, been practically making rates in every complaint that it has considered. Senator Clapp of Minnesota, through cross-examination as skillful as any that I have ever known to be conducted in any court or forum, has brought out this fact and laid it bare before the committee. In cross-examination counsel often make the effort to confuse truthful witnesses; the Senator has no such object in view; his purpose was to extract the truth, and by the power that he has exhibited in this line he has succeeded in clearing up this subject to such an extent that there is no longer any justification for any opposition to a measure investing the Commission with a rate-making power.

Why do I say this? I say it because witness after witness, in answer to his pointed questions, has stated that whenever the Commision has held a rate to be unreasonable the railroad has always adopted the rate that the Commission has suggested. In other words, the railroads have accepted the suggestion of the Commission as a judgment and have invariably abided by its terms. If this is so—and the evidence overwhelmingly demonstrates it to be so—why do they object now to conferring upon the Commission the power to put into the form of a legal judgment a result that the railroads have always regarded and obeyed as a practical judgment against them? If the inquiry before the Commission, for instance, was whether a dollar rate was a reasonable rate between two points, and the Commission held that it was unreasonable and suggested that a rate of eighty cents would be the proper rate, the railroads have immediately lowered the rate and put the eighty-cent rate into operation. Their officers have taken great pride, as shown by the evidence, in testifying to the fact that they have uniformly followed the suggestions of the Commission.

Why have they taken this course? There must have been a reason and a motive for it. I will give it to you; it is because the companies knew that if they trifled with the Commission and merely lowered the rate to 95 cents, in the instance that I have given, they would be brought before the Commission again and ultimately, upon continual complaints, would be compelled to reduce the rate to 80 cents.

Now, I ask in all fairness, what is the objection to empowering the Commission in the first place to declare an 80-cent rate, instead of merely suggesting it and driving it to the same point, step by step, by successive complaints? There can be no sensible objection to it, and every evil result that has been predicted by all the advocates that have been furnished by the railroad to the committee as likely to follow from the grant of such a power, inevitably and practically follows from the method of proceeding in the manner in which it is now exercised by the Commission. The truth of the matter is, then, that in conferring the rate-making power upon the Commission we are in reality only reposing in it by law a power which in practice it is exercising in every case that arises before it.

THE POWER OF THE COMMISSION AND OF THE COURTS.

I have no fear or anxiety, not the slightest, that the Commission will perpetrate any act of injustice under this measure, and I believe that the power of the courts under the fifth amendment is ample to protect the property of the carriers. If the Senate, however, should take a different view and invest the courts with the power to review the proceedings of the Commission as to the reasonableness or justness of its orders, then I shall in proper time offer an amendment that the courts complete the work that is before them and that they do not engage in the idle process of sending cases back again to the Commission without any effective order or legal suggestion as to its future action.

If, for instance, the Commission should determine that the rate of a dollar is unreasonable and lower the rate to 75 cents, and the Senate proposes to give the courts the power upon review to determine the question whether a rate of 75 cents so fixed by the Commission is just and reasonable, then I want the courts, if they reverse the action of the Commission, to determine in the case before them, with proper parties and evidence submitted and issue made up, what the maximum rate ought to be and enjoin any charge beyond it. I am not in favor of giving the courts any review, as I have already said, and now again emphasize, to reopen the proceedings of the Commission beyond the fifth amendment, but if the Senate decides that the courts shall have the right to reopen them, then I want the court to complete its work and make a final adjudication of the matter. Can this be done? I am absolutely satisfied, after an exhaustive and careful examination of the cases, that it can. No one can arrive at an intelligent conclusion upon this delicate branch of the subject except by an analytical investigation of the authorities. I know that it has been frequently said that this is conferring upon the court a legislative power.

I do not accept a word of that suggestion. On the contrary, I believe this is a power and a jurisdiction that courts of equity are constantly exercising, and to deny them this power now, if you propose to invest them with the right of review, it seems to me is an absolute anomaly and absurdity under the established equity practice of the Federal courts. It is the unfortunate use of the word legislative, as I have said, in several of the Supreme Court decisions that has given rise to all this difficulty. The Supreme Court did not mean to give to this word the definition that we give to it. What it meant was that courts should not be governed by rules of public policy and expediency and enter into the province of rate making for the railroads of the country. It never meant, and it never could have meant, that when a court in a given case sets aside an unreasonable rate, that it could not in that case decide what was a reasonable rate.

There is a whole line of authorities tending to support the proposition that I am contending for. Among them I may mention the Kingwood Coal Company case (125 Federal Reporter, p. 252), the Missouri Pacific Railroad case (189 U. S.), and principally the Ianviere case (174 Mass., 514), the last case decided by Justice Holmes, now on the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States. I adopt the reasoning of this last authority, and if you will only substitute the words "railroad rates" for "water rates" you have an enunciation of the principles for which I am contending. If you give the court simply the power to review without giving the power to adjudicate you are transferring the playground from the commission to the courts, and the trifling process that is now in vogue under the Commission will then take place under the courts, as the courts time and time again will send back to the Commission and the Commission back again to the courts the cases that come under them, without ultimate action or final decree upon the part of either the courts or the Commission.

I want to say, Mr. President, the passing of this bill will not injure a legitimate investment on this earth in the hand of an innocent holder. It might cause a temporary shock to the gentlemen who have overcapitalized these institutions, but the country will give no response of sympathy.

I believe in the honest acquisition of wealth, but I abhor its accumulation at the expense of human suffering and at the sacrifice of human rights. I sometimes shudder as I cross the path of havoc and desolation that it has caused, and I shrink in horror from every spectral monument of earthly splendor that is built upon ruined homes and broken hearts, upon penury's touching wants and labor's unrequited toil.

LET THERE BE A TRUCE BETWEEN THE RAILROADS AND THE PEOPLE.

Mr. President, this is an issue of grave importance that is before us. We are face to face with a gigantic system, a system that if it could combine its conflicting interests could, through the use of the wealth that it controls, the influence it wields, and the patronage that it dispenses, sweep a political party from the face of the earth and dominate the affairs of the people in the halls of legislation. As a rule, the men with great minds who are at the head of these concerns do not want to trample upon public rights and do not desire to arouse popular resentment or even indignation. They are not violators of the law, and are generally ready to adjust their differences with the people by the arbitrament of peaceful methods rather than by the arbitrament of the public pulse.

They know that with the populace a railroad is not an idol; they know that there is a feeling prevalent with the masses that when a railroad wants a right of way over the right of way of the people it generally sweeps to its destination like the engine on its tracks, with every impediment and obstacle removed from its path and sidetracked to facilitate its passage. The great financial intellects who control these enterprises, looking toward the horizon, may observe away off in the distance the symptoms of a storm which may perhaps be deflected from its course, but whose barely perceptible mutterings still carry a certain degree of uneasiness to their repose. They have an intuition that perhaps the day might come in this land of republican institutions when a party, tearing away from the vassalage of precedent, may, without a field marshal to direct it, inaugurate a precedent of its own and may announce upon its banners that it is the party of the people against all combinations of centralized wealth and industrial oppression.

It will not be the first time in the history of this country that parties have been suddenly ushered into existence. The Democratic party came into power almost unconsciously to itself; the Republican party had a premature birth before the period had arrived for the throes and pangs that followed instead of preceding its nativity.

And so it is that at any day, without any concert of action, without premeditated purpose, without drilling or discipline, the American people may take an erratic notion into their heads that a party to succeed must stand for a single idea and that it would be a good idea to combine them against the encroachments of monopoly that dictates its own prices at the home and fireside of the American consumer. We do not want any contest of this sort. The people do not require anything unreasonable. The intelligent masses of the American people are not deluded and misled by agitators and by demagogues, who, if they were allowed to administer their own prescriptions, would strike a deadly blow at the great monuments of commerce that have been reared upon this continent, would drive the lifeblood from individual enterprise and activity, and would inevitably succeed in bringing about the very disasters and calamities that it was their purpose to obviate.

A man who parades as the enemy of a railroad simply because it is a railroad, and, as the foe of corporate enterprise, constantly opposes every grant or privilege that these systems ask in order to efficiently perform the services exacted of them, is the curse and the bane of the Republic. So far as I am concerned, I would like to say right here that whatever interests I have are closely allied with the railroads. A single railroad, by the turning of a switch, could inflict irreparable injury upon whatever little interests I may have or represent. Not only this, but in my profession the holdings of those with whom I come into daily contact are largely invested in railroad securities.

In view of my position I think that I am perhaps in a situation to advance a few suggestions to the officers of these roads. If I were in their place I would throw no obstacles in the way of this legislation. It is the greatest error that they could possibly commit to oppose every reformatory measure of this character. So far as values are concerned, this legislation will not affect them in the slightest degree, and there will be no radical disturbance of transportation rates.

The Interstate Commerce Commission will not dare to take any step that will depreciate the property of the people, or that will cause any extreme changes in railroad management or policy. The business interests of the country would not submit to such action, and the courts would not sanction or tolerate it. I would therefore advise the railroads, as their friend, to withdraw their agents and their counsel and their representatives from the scene of conflict and let the conflict cease. Let a truce go up between the people and the corporate interests of the country; let the corporate interests make some concessions to the rights of the public. You depend upon the people for your livelihood and your profits absolutely and entirely. Now, take them into your confidence and do not possess yourselves of the vain delusion that your railroads exist for the sole benefit of your stockholders and officers, and that the people have no rights that it is your duty to regard. If you fail to take some such advice as this, then I believe you will rue the day. I have no fear that the hour will ever come when ignorance and anarchy will prevail in this country; that thought does not disturb me. What I fear is an economic uprising of the intelligent and substantial property interests of the country against monopoly and unlawful combinations of centralized wealth. Avoid this strife! Anarchy and socialism can be regulated by law and put down by force. Intelligence, that is spreading upon the wings of lightning, can never be cowered and defeated.

What every one wants to accomplish, every one who has the welfare of his country at heart, is to prevent the extreme and radical elements of both parties from obtaining control and then forming an alliance that may threaten danger to our institutions. This is the real peril that menaces us and one way to avoid it is for corporate interests not to continually throw down the gauntlet and challenge public opinion whenever essential reforms like this are under discussion in legislative bodies. Public opinion in this country is not in favor of parcelling out the railroad franchises of the country among a few systems and giving them undisputed sway over the territory of the Union. Let me tell you, too, that when public opinion is in pursuit of an object of this sort it generally reaches its accomplishment. I have often watched the struggle.

I have seen the gladiators meet, the giant form of monopoly enter the arena boasting of its prowess and confident of its triumph, and then I have seen it quake and cower; I have seen men of sober judgment under the motive power of their convictions whom it was impossible to swerve, pressing on their pilgrimage to the shrine of public honor; I have seen the boisterous clamor of the mob silenced and suppressed and the agitator and the empiric ridiculed to oblivion; I have seen the people without leadership beaten at the polls by the disciplined forces of party organization; but one thing I have never yet observed in the whole history of American politics, and that is I have never yet known the people in the pursuit of justice to sign a treaty of capitulation, and I have never known a great principle to proclaim an ultimate surrender, and I have never yet seen the day, though the cause may be retarded and the hour may be postponed, when the lines were clearly drawn between monopoly and its victims, when the right was on the one side and the wrong was on the other, however ominous the prospect and however desperate the encounter, that the privileged clans of favoritism and oppression did not at the very first exposure and attack retreat before the allied forces of the people in the halls of legislation. [Manifestation of applause in the galleries.]

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland a question before he takes his seat. I noticed he said just before he closed that he would advise the officers of the railroads to strike from this bill the suspending orders. I wish to ask the Senator just what he meant by that?

Mr. RAYNER. That question has been put so many times that I do not know——

Mr. LODGE. No; the Senator misunderstands me.

Mr. RAYNER. The same question has been put at me three or four times this morning, as if I meant——

Mr. LODGE. The Senator misunderstands me.

Mr. RAYNER. I beg pardon.

Mr. LODGE. The question has not been put before. What have the railroad officers to do with this bill?

Mr. RAYNER. That question has been put to me three or four times this morning. The railroad officers have nothing to do with this bill, and I do not think any railroad officer in the country could influence the Senator from Massachusetts, or the Senator from Rhode Island, or the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. Then what did the Senator mean a moment ago when he referred to the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Rhode Island——

Mr. RAYNER. Let me finish. I do not believe any railroad officer could influence any of them to swerve in the slightest from the path of public duty. I have not any such idea. I believe that the Senator and every Senator upon this floor is trying to do his duty. But I believe this: I believe that if the railroad officers and the railroad counsel and the railroads and the railroad interests were to confer to-night and unanimously agree to strike the suspending orders from the bill they would be stricken from the bill.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks the railroad officers put those words into the bill?

Mr. RAYNER. I do not. But do you suppose——

Mr. LODGE. It is a bill for which the Senator proposes to vote.

Mr. RAYNER. This is a contest now between the railroads and some one else—call them what you will—either shippers or anything else. Does the Senator from Massachusetts suppose that if the railroad counsel, as representatives of the railroads, were to agree and come to me—they need not go to you; I would be glad to see them; I have no hesitation in talking with railroad counsel—does he suppose that if they were to come and say, "We are authorized to say that we do not want these words 'suspending orders;' we are ready to go into court and stand by the order of the Commission"—does the Senator think there would be much practical trouble in striking them out of the bill? Does the Senator think, notwithstanding what the railroads were to ask for, that it would still be insisted upon that those words be kept in?

Mr. LODGE. I do not regard this legislation as a question between the railroads and anybody else. I think this is a great measure of public import, affecting the entire people and all the business interests of this country, and I do not think it matters what the railroad lawyers wish or what the railroad directors or officers wish. It is for us to say here on our responsibility whether those words ought to be in the bill or not. I do not think anybody has anything to say about this bill in its present stage except the Senate, which is called upon to deal with it.

If I believed that the omission of those words would render this bill unconstitutional, I would not vote for the bill. I can not understand the position of a Senator who, believing in his conscience that a bill is against the Constitution of the United States still votes to put it on the statute books.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I rose in order to ask the Senator from Maryland why he saw fit to say in the language he employed that the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Rhode Island bore evidences of pleasure on their faces on some account or other. I can not recall just what the account was.

Mr. RAYNER. Because——

Mr. FORAKER. I want to know why the Senator would make that kind of a remark. Does the Senator mean to imply that the Senator from Ohio has any interest whatever in any railroad, or is under any obligation to any railroad, or that he represents any special interest, or that he has aught in view except only to legislate here according to the responsibility he assumed when he took his oath of office?

Mr. RAYNER. Does the Senator from Ohio think because I said he had a cheerful countenance that that is demonstrable proof that he is connected with railroads?

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator said it in a connection which could not bear any other interpretation.

Mr. RAYNER. I put myself in the same category. I said "you and the Senator from Rhode Island and myself." I am perfectly willing to have it so. I know that you have no connection with railroads.

Mr. FORAKER. Then why is that brought in? It is not the first time that it has been mentioned, and that is the only reason why I rose to answer it. If it had been the first time, I might have thought that it had occurred in the heat of argument or was a part of the very beautiful peroration with which the Senator concluded his speech, and I might have allowed it to go by. But I heard another Senator, in concluding an argument in this body a few days ago, refer to the advocacy of special interests. I intended to ask him what he meant, but we became engaged in a colloquy and it passed out of mind.

I want to say once for all, if it is necessary to say anything at all—and it is something of a humiliation to me to say it—that I do not want any Senator to insinuate again that I have any interest in any railroad, or that I am an advocate of any special interest, or that I am influenced here in my conduct and in my arguments and in my votes by anything whatever except only a sense of duty. That I want distinctly understood.

I assume that the Senator from Maryland has no interest in any railroad. I assume that he is under no obligation to any railroad. I assume he is trying to represent the best interests of the whole people. I hope he will be willing to accord that same high purpose to myself.

Mr. RAYNER. I have done that so often this morning that it has gotten to be tiresome. I am satisfied the Senator from Ohio has not the slightest interest, except the interest of the people, in this matter. I have said that frequently. If there has been a remark in the heat of debate, a word used that the Senator seems to be sensitive about, I am not responsible for the condition of his mind upon the subject. I say here now that I think the Senator from Ohio is standing, as he conceives, for the rights of the people. I think he is contending for constitutional principles. I think he wants to pass a bill for the best interests of the people; but it can not be said, as the Senator from Massachusetts has said, that the railroads are not interested in this controversy. That is a proposition I never before heard asserted.

Mr. LODGE. I did not say they were not interested in the controversy.

Mr. RAYNER. You said they were not parties.

Mr. LODGE. I said it was not a question between the railroads and somebody else, and one set of Senators here on one side——

Mr. RAYNER. I never said that.

Mr. LODGE. And another on the other side.

Mr. RAYNER. I never said that.

Mr. LODGE. They must be if the railroads are on one side.

Mr. RAYNER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts mean to say that the railroads are not parties—not in the legal sense—to this controversy; that they have not a part in it; are not interested?

Mr. LODGE. They are not taking any part in it that I am aware of. They are the subject of the controversy.

Mr. RAYNER. If they are not taking any part in it that the Senator is aware of, then the Senator has not read a line of the examination, because hundreds of pages have been consumed by counsel on behalf of the railroads before the committee advocating their principles. If they have not taken any part in it, the Senator has not read the examination.

Mr. LODGE. They were summoned to testify.

Mr. RAYNER. Summoned?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. RAYNER. Who summoned them; the railroads?

Mr. LODGE. No; the committee summoned them. It had the right to summon them, and they appeared. But this is not a controversy——

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] tells me they came of their own accord; that they were not summoned at all.

Mr. LODGE. The chairman of the committee summoned them, as I have understood.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. One moment. I desire to finish the few words I started to say.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not care how long I wait, but I wish to have it understood that I still have the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. FORAKER. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I merely wish to repeat that I do not regard this as a controversy between the railroads on the one side and the shippers on the other. I regard it as a great question, coming up for settlement before the Congress of the United States, to be decided according to our best judgment, not in the interest of the railroads or in the interest of the shippers, or in the interest of anybody else, but for what is best for the people of the United States, and that we are here in our function as Senators, not representing railroads or shippers or special interests or anyone else, but to do what we honestly think is best for the whole country.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has so completely made the speech I was intending to make that I will yield the floor with only another word.

It is true that railroad men and men representing railroads appeared before the committee. Why should they not appear before it? Are we to legislate about a great interest of this kind without permitting men who are interested in such property to be heard? Was it not an advantage to us to have men come who were familiar with this business to give us the benefit of their views? Are the railroad men of this country criminals? They are citizens and entitled to all the rights of other citizens.

Mr. President, I have heard a great many men in the course of my experience in public life assume to be the special representatives of the people, but I have never yet heard one assume to be such special representative who was any more the representative of the people than the average man, to say the most for him.

I do not like that assumption on the part of anybody. I have no interest, and I do not believe any other Senator here has any interest whatever, with respect to this legislation except only to make the best bill we can make to remedy the evils that are justly complained of. I think I have the best bill that has been offered. [Laughter.] I have spoken on it once, and I am going to speak on it again.

While I am going to vote for a court review when that question comes up, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] is right when he says the result will be to force two hearings where there should be only one, and to make nugatory in large degree that which it is intended the bill shall accomplish. But I have no special responsibility for this bill. I am anxious that it shall be made as good as it is possible to make it, and I am going to vote for a review, because I think that is necessary to the proper protection of these great property interests. But no matter how amended, this bill raises all kinds of troublesome questions, and must, I am sure, prove a disappointment.

Now, I think instead of having that kind of legislation, we should have the kind of legislation suggested in the measure I have presented, legislation which amounts simply to an amending of the Elkins law, in its third section. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] has pointed out how effective that law has proven. It is effective to prevent rebates; it is effective to prevent discriminations; and if you will amend it in the way I have suggested, it will be equally effective to prevent excessive rates; and it will do it in an expeditious way, and it will do it in a way that will be of advantage to the shipper, and the shipper will prefer it to the legislation you are proposing to enact. That section when so amended will provide that when anybody wants to make a complaint of excessive rates, or discriminations, or about a rebate, nothing more will be necessary than to call the attention of the Interstate Commerce Commission informally to it, and the Commission, without any expense to him, shall make such preliminary investigation as it may see fit to make to enable it to determine whether there be probable cause for the complaint, in which event the Commission shall send it to the court, where it shall be prosecuted in the name of the United States Government, and at the expense of the United States Government, and without any expense whatever to the shipper, where all rights under the expedition act referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], as this provision will be expeditiously and efficiently determined.

It seems to me that the great trouble, as I have said heretofore in the Senate, speaking on this subject, with the shippers heretofore has been that they can not single handed and alone cope with railroads in litigation. It is unjust to a shipper. He is at too great a disadvantage, there is too much burden of expense upon him, when he is required to go out and fight before the Commission or fight in the courts a great railroad in this country. We ought to take that burden from him. Then no shipper will be afraid to challenge a rate, to challenge a rebate, to institute a proceeding to have relief finally secured in the court where there will be no clashing with constitutional principles or rules with respect to the rights of property or the rights of individuals.

I have already said, but I want to say it again while I have the attention of everybody, that I do not believe this legislation which we now have under consideration is worth the paper it is written on, if passed in this form. It is unconstitutional, Mr. President, not alone on one ground, but on half a dozen grounds. I have already pointed out some of these constitutional defects. I am going to point out other grounds on which it is, in my opinion, unconstitutional, but if it were not unconstitutional, it will prove disappointing in its consequences. I mean it will disappoint the people who want this legislation.

The shippers of this country will not under it get the relief they are seeking.

Now, why encounter all these serious questions? Why run the risk of all this disappointment when by sticking to the courts of the country, where we always have found relief, we can work out efficient remedies against every evil that has been suggested? I intend to offer, and to speak in a few days when I get the opportunity in support of, an amendment to the third section of the Elkins law, either as a substitute for this bill or as an additional section to be added to it—an alternative section. On account of the lateness of the hour I will not enter upon an argument now. I have before me a number of authorities sustaining the competency of Congress to confer on the courts the right to enjoin, when a rate is challenged as excessive, all the excess of that rate that may be over and above the statutory standard of what is just and reasonable. The authorities, I will content myself with saying, are, to my mind, conclusive, and there is no serious legal question if that be so that could possibly arise upon that kind of legislation.

So the question I want to put to every Senator and to have every Senator think about is, whether he will vote for a bill which the Senator from Maryland says will be clearly unconstitutional, for the reason he has assigned, and which other Senators have said will be clearly unconstitutional, for the reasons they have assigned, and which I have undertaken to show is unconstitutional on half a dozen different grounds. Will we vote for that kind of a measure, and thus, if it perish in the courts, disappoint those who seek the passage of the bill, or, if it survive, disappoint the people by its remediless result?

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, during the opening of the argument of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] I asked him a question, prompted by the position he took, namely, whether or not he thought that if a railroad company's rates were fixed by a commission, and those rates, it was contended, were confiscatory, the company would have no remedy in court unless a remedy were provided in the bill? I understood the Senator to say they would have no remedy unless the amount involved was $2,000. What I want to say very briefly and say in connection with his speech is this: If I believed it was necessary to the constitutionality of the bill to make some provision for a review, I certainly would stand for that proposition. Nor do I say that I will not under any circumstances stand for a review or support some provision for a proper review.

I have heard some suggestions—I do not know anything about it—that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] is preparing an amendment along certain lines. If he shall offer that amendment, or if some other person shall offer an amendment embodying what I understand will be the provisions of that, I may support it. But I do not believe that the constitutionality of any measure of this character depends upon a right of review being fixed in and incorporated into the law. The Senator from Maryland says that unless $2,000 is involved no appeal to the courts can be made. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the provision of the judiciary act which requires that $2,000 shall be in issue in order to give a circuit court jurisdiction has not been construed by the courts to mean that actually $2,000 in money must be in controversy, but if the controversy involves a question which will reduce the value of property, if the party complaining is not protected against it, to the amount of $2,000 or more, the courts have jurisdiction. Therefore if a small rate were complained of, although it might amount to only a few dollars, as a matter of fact, in that particular instance, yet if the enforcement of that rate would decrease the value of the property of the corporation $2,000 or more, or would amount to a confiscatory rate, there would be no doubt at all about the jurisdiction of a court of equity to entertain the complaint of the corporation.

Therefore I say that the contention of the Senator that the bill would be unconstitutional because there is no provision for a review can not be sustained. It may be that the courts have to be given jurisdiction over particular cases before they can exercise it, but, Mr. President, if a person's constitutional rights are infringed, if his property is being damaged or injured or depreciated in value, and if the effect in the long run will amount to $2,000, the courts have jurisdiction, and he has a right to appeal to them.

Mr. TILLMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Minnesota has taken his seat. I suppose he does not want to go on now. I was going to suggest, if the Senator from Minnesota wants to make a speech on the subject, that we have had too many hours—I will not say too many hours except in the sense of too many for his purpose—we have had a great deal of eloquence and some very fine and brilliant oratory and some beautiful passages at arms between distinguished lawyers, all of which I have enjoyed, and I think everybody else has; but I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that it would be much better for him to take the floor as soon as I have said a few words, and go on in the morning. I think we have had enough——

Mr. NELSON. That is what I was about to state, that I desire to take the floor now for the purpose of addressing the Senate on the bill, and will submit my remarks to-morrow.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am glad the Senator will do that. Now, I wish to say a few words in reference to what has just occurred.

Mr. President, during my eleven years' service here I have listened to many very strong and forceful debates on legal questions, and I have always noticed that my friends of the legal profession can advance arguments pro and con with equal cogency and force on both sides of almost any question. On this question, which has been buffeted about to and fro this afternoon, I cling to the one general proposition. I will premise that by stating for the benefit of the Senator from Ohio that it is very queer, if the power which is proposed to be given to the Interstate Commerce Commission is unconstitutional, that this bill would fail as a fraud and a humbug if we put that in without we put a whole lot of other things in. But it is very strange that this very same power was exercised for ten years by that Commission without any lawyer in the United States successfully bringing a suit to declare it was unconstitutional or that the Commission did not have that right.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator certainly is not familiar with the decisions concerned.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am speaking of the effect. So far as the legal technicality is concerned, of course the Commission fixed the rate and then went to the court to compel obedience.

Mr. FORAKER. The question of the power of the Commission to fix rates was questioned almost from the very beginning.

Mr. TILLMAN. Nevertheless, it was never overthrown until it had been exercised for ten years.

Mr. FORAKER. Not overthrown; but what I was calling attention to was the unqualified statement of the Senator from South Carolina that for ten years that power was exercised without any lawyer in the country raising the question about its right to exercise the power.

Mr. TILLMAN. Possibly I was speaking a little too broadly to say that.

Mr. FORAKER. A good deal too broadly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I intended merely to say that the court sustained that authority in the Commission and never overthrew it until 1897.

Mr. FORAKER. The court——

Mr. TILLMAN. My legal friends and my capitalistic friends and my lawyer friends all shake their heads; but nevertheless I reiterate the statement that the Interstate Commerce Commission heard the people and granted relief by orders which were obeyed by the carriers, and when they did not obey them went to the courts and got the courts to put in force the machinery of the law and compel their obedience. It is very queer that all at once we now discover that the people can not get this relief without a whole lot of other machinery, as I said, being added to it, which will put the thing we do not know where. I cling to the horns of the altar which my friend from Maryland has erected, as to the suspension of the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission by the court under whatever guise it may act, whether chancery or otherwise. However, we have no chancery court.

Mr. SPOONER. Equity.

Mr. TILLMAN. Equity. It is not the same thing in the United States. We in South Carolina used to have chancellors in other days, but now we have judges. It is equity. I say you want to give the court the right in equity to step forward and decree that the order of the Commission shall be suspended; and I declare if you do that you will rob the people of the chance of redress, and you bring about a condition of paralysis of this effort to relieve the people that will cause immense trouble in this country. Now, I make that prediction. The people are going to have relief.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator said the bill would not give it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Did I not say that you could drive not only an automobile through it, but a freight train, too? [Laughter.]

Mr. DOLLIVER. My honored friend from South Carolina on one occasion told me that when he said that he had not read the bill at all.

Mr. TILLMAN. I just went on the general supposition that a bill that had had such paternity, coming as I understood, and as I said the other day, from the great legal lights who were very friendly to the railroads, must have in it some saving grace which those corporations wanted, or else they would not have brought it here.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I think it is due to myself, as well as to my colleague, to say that the great bulk of the bill came from the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that the really great lawyer who had to do with it was the Attorney-General of the United States.

Mr. TILLMAN. And the two gentlemen from Iowa—one at this end and the other at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I will say to my honored friend that I have my first boast to make on this floor of being a great lawyer. I have not acquired the art of saying of one that he is the greatest lawyer in the world and of another that he is still greater, and then advancing my own opinion contradicting both.

Mr. TILLMAN. I admire the Senator's modesty much. We all know that in the bottom of his soul he thinks he is as great a lawyer as either of them. [Laughter.]

But I do not care to discuss the issue, except to say that I cling to the horns of the altar, and I plead with Senators on both sides, the lawyers on our side and on the other side, to give us this proposition, in whatever shape you choose, so that the Supreme Court will sustain it, and then we will not have the orders of the Commission suspended by any judge except by a Supreme Court judge. That is the point.

Now, I just want to say to my friend from Ohio, who made some allusion to his bill a moment ago, and, with the pride of paternity, he practically said it was the only good bill that had been introduced. He forgot that little baby of mine [laughter], and which he, along with my friend from Rhode Island, was so much in love with when it was brought modestly into this Chamber that they indicated a desire, if I would consent to put some little cloak of court review around the little infant, that they should adopt it. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. FORAKER. I said in open Senate, and it is in the RECORD, what I thought of the bill introduced by the Senator from South Carolina. I said if we were to go into the business of government rate making at all I thought his bill was the best one proposed to make such a provision. I think so yet. It is simple, it is straightforward, just like the Senator—a little blunt, a little brusque—but it gets there all the same. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I had equally a high opinion of the bill to which the Senator from South Carolina refers and clung to it until he deserted it himself and voted to report a bill through which he now says he can run a train of cars.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I never deserted my infant. That poor little waif is sleeping calmly and peacefully in one of the pigeon holes of the desk of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] who is the honored chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I found that there was no earthly show for the bantling before that committee, because the Senator from Rhode Island insisted that he must put his own dress on it, and I was distrustful of his friendly offices in that regard. [Laughter.]

Now, then, to return to the subject-matter in a brief way, my bill simply provided that the interstate-commerce law as originally framed, and as it was amended later on, should have incorporated in it the express power, simply and in the briefest possible words, to give the Commission the right to fix a rate, no more and no less, because the Supreme Court had declared that Congress had not given that right originally. I thought if we could amend that law, which had been litigated and illuminated by judicial opinion and decided the Commission did not have that power, though it took the court ten years to discover it, and if we would put into the law that power, we would at least give to the country that measure of substantive relief which would enable the Commission to examine into a rate, declare it was too high, and then give redress by fixing a rate which would in its judgment be just and reasonable. That is all there was about it. As I said, that bantling is sleeping peacefully.

Somebody, by some hocus pocus—I hardly know how it happened—came to us unexpectedly and in a great hurry dumped this baby in my arms. [Laughter.] It is supposed to be, or said to be, for the purpose of giving the people relief. I am suspicious of the paternity of the brat. I am suspicious of the bantling itself. But finding that the Interstate Commerce Committee would do nothing but talk and talk, that they would not take up and consider and undertake to prepare and send to the Senate a bill upon which we could agree, probably because we could not agree, as there were radical differences of opinion in the committee which made it practically impossible that we could ever agree, I thought it was best to bring this controversy into the Senate and out in the open, so that the people of the country might watch the debate, see what is said by each and every man here, and then watch how he votes, because if we do not get this thing settled in the Senate this year, and if we do not get it settled in this Congress before it expires, I do not hesitate to predict that the people will send a lower House of Congress here that will heed their demands, and in time they will send a Senate here who will do it.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, the hour is a little late, but I want to say just a word or two.

There seems to be a curious misunderstanding of the framework of the pending bill. It is a bill to confide to the Interstate Commerce Commission legislative discretion as to fixing railway rates without undertaking to delegate the legislative power which the Constitution gives to Congress. It is inconsistent with the theory of judicial review, because, as my honored friend from Ohio said a moment ago, it certainly is ridiculous to provide for fixing these rates, after a full hearing, by the order of a great commission of business men and then turn their work over to be reviewed and corrected by a circuit judge of the United States—clothed with a sort of appellate jurisdiction over the orders of the Commission.

No provision was made in this bill for a judicial review because, as the framers of the bill interpreted the law, the Constitution and the laws of the United States give access to the circuit court of the United States for the purpose of testing the constitutionality of the orders made by the Commission. Now, my honored friend from South Carolina says that this provision for the suspension of the orders puts him on his guard and compels him to look upon the whole matter with suspicion.

Why was no provision made to abridge the equity powers of that court? Let the Senate understand that the litigant goes into that court in his own name, in an independent proceeding in equity, to defend his right of property under the Constitution of the United States. The court of equity being confronted by a petitioner claiming that his property is being taken by this order, that the order imposes upon him a rate that is ruinous to his business, destructive of his property rights under the Constitution, taking away from him the very earnings that are necessary to carry on his business, how would it be possible for Congress to say to the court in such a case, sitting to determine these constitutional rights, that it shall not have the power to preserve the status of the property pending the litigation?

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. The pivotal point upon which this question seems to me to turn is, first, whether or not you shall have a court of review, and, second, whether or not the rate fixed by the Commission shall stand until set aside.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Yes.

Mr. CLAY. I wish to ask the Senator as to the first proposition, if we were to pass a law simply requiring the Commission to hear complaints and to fix reasonable and just rates, stopping there, without saying a single word about courts, is it not true that the carrier would have a right to go into the court and have determined the question as to whether or not the rate is a compensatory rate, regardless of any provision for a court?

Again, I ask the Senator if the rate fixed by the Commission is to go into effect and to stay in effect until set aside or suspended by a court, could not the bill be amended in this way: That the rate fixed by the Commission shall go into effect and stand as a proper rate until notice and a full hearing both to the shipper and carrier?

Mr. DOLLIVER. That may be all right. My own theory about it is that you can not abridge the right of a litigant in a court of equity to that equitable relief which the law administers.

Mr. CLAY. I agree with the Senator to some extent. We could not deprive the carrier of the right to go into a court of equity and set forth in a bill that the rate fixed is not a compensatory rate. I do not like the word "confiscatory." I mean to say that the carrier is entitled to a rate that is a just compensation for the services performed, and no other man ought to want any other kind of a rate.

I do not believe that we could deprive the court of the right of determining whether or not that is a compensatory rate. But can we not say to the carrier, "The rate fixed by the Commission shall stand as a proper rate until you give notice?" In other words, the presiding judge will simply grant a rule nisi, calling for a hearing after due notice, and then determine whether or not the rate shall be set aside and enjoined. Can we not prevent its being set aside until that is done?

Mr. DOLLIVER. That may be true; but the greatest lawyer I know of on interstate-commerce questions, Mr. Kernan, who for a long time was a railroad commissioner in the State of New York, and has since that time probably tried more of these interstate-commerce cases than any other American lawyer, stated before the House committee that if you add a special burden to a litigant's standing before that court of equity you destroy the constitutionality of the act. He was speaking then of what is known as the "Cooper-Quarles bill," which bill undertook to provide that a writ of preliminary injunction might issue when it plainly appeared from the record that the rate was unlawful. He asked the committee to save the constitutionality of that law by striking out the words "plainly appeared." His theory was that every litigant in equity should stand upon the same basis in the court. It certainly is ridiculous to say that a court has the constitutional right to vacate one of these orders because it is destroying the carrier's property and at the same time can be deprived of the right to suspend it; that is to say, the power to preserve the status pending a final hearing.

I worked a good many days to frame a provision that might stand the test of the courts and would limit the right of preliminary injunction, and as a student of the question came at last reluctantly to the opinion, first, that we can not abridge the equity powers of that court, and, second, that if we do abridge them we must send every litigant into court upon the same basis, because it is a part of our institutions that everybody shall have the equal protection of the laws in the United States.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Are not these courts statutory courts created by Congress?

Mr. DOLLIVER. They are.

Mr. TILLMAN. Have they any inherent powers——

Mr. DOLLIVER. Yes; they have——

Mr. TILLMAN. Other than those given by statute?

Mr. DOLLIVER. They have the inherent powers given them by the Constitution.

Mr. TILLMAN. I thought the Senator from Maryland read two opinions this evening which declared to the contrary, and so it appears to me on general principles. Remember, my law is cornfield law, and common sense, if I have any. It appears to me that if Congress can create these courts, as Congress has created them, therefore Congress can destroy them; that the creator can limit his creature in any way he sees fit, and if he can not that the creature has outgrown the creator, and we are at the end of our rope to give the people relief.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I am not going to quarrel with a man because his law is cornfield law.

Mr. TILLMAN. I give my common-sense view now, not a technical legal view.

Mr. DOLLIVER. But a good cornfield lawyer will occasionally glance at our fundamental charter, and my honorable friend does that, and with great effect sometimes.

It will be observed that while the creation of this court lies in Congress the judicial power extends to it by virtue of the Constitution. The Constitution provides that—

> The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.

Mr. TILLMAN. Did that judicial power carry with it the right of this court to exercise power that Congress did not want it to exercise?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I think so, but if it is not so——

Mr. TILLMAN. That is against common sense. I will never swallow any such doctrine as that.

Mr. DOLLIVER. If that is not so, what does my friend say to the proposition of sending one litigant into the court, to take another agricultural figure, with a load of hay on his back, while another goes in perfectly free to invoke the equity jurisdiction?

Mr. TILLMAN. But these are giants that are going into court, and their purpose is to get loose from the gyves of the law and trample the people in the mire.

Mr. DOLLIVER. But, curiously enough, our Supreme Court has decided that they are persons, within the meaning of that phrase.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Supreme Court is not infallible and reverses itself sometimes, and it will do it on this case before we get through with it, and you will see it.

Mr. DOLLIVER. If my honorable friend succeeds in getting that limitation in and gets the court to support it, of course it would be very agreeable to me, as I have already said.

Mr. TILLMAN. All I contend for is that we shall give the people the benefit of the doubt and leave the courts to pray over it.

Mr. DOLLIVER. But I want my honored friend to remember that his colleague, the Senator from Texas, is himself in doubt about the constitutionality of this business, and proposes to accompany the power of the court with a suggestion to the court in the law itself that we put it under grave doubts and beg the court not to destroy the whole law on its account.

Mr. TILLMAN. I say that my friend from Texas is just like all the other railroad lawyers here. He is bound by the precedents. He can not get away from the technical side of the drill through which he has been compelled to go in giving heed to decisions of the court on this, that, and the other point. I go beyond all that to the foundation principles of the Government, and hold that the Constitution did not contemplate the creation by Congress of a creature that would get beyond the power of Congress to control.

Mr. DOLLIVER. While it is true that the Senator from Texas is prone to follow judicial precedents, unfortunately that is also the practice of the courts.

Mr. TILLMAN. But I say the court has reversed itself on two or three occasions—on a hundred of them, I reckon. I have seen in some little investigations that I have made where they would wobble from one side to the other and finally they began to turn around and go back.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Then my friend has lost confidence in the law as an exact science?

Mr. TILLMAN. Has my friend from Iowa ever found any evidence in the law of an exact science?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I have found comfort in certain first principles, one of which is that you can not open a court of equity, to which everybody is to have access in defense of his property, and send one litigant into it perfectly free to invoke all its powers and limit another, so that the equity power of the court is not equally within reach of all, without violating the law of that forum which is the essence of our institutions, "the equal protection of the law."

Mr. TILLMAN. Possibly the trouble has been that the court has declared that a corporation is a person. It was a very handy thing to do, and I suppose it was necessary for it in ordinary litigation. But in this case it is the actual man and the artificial man contending for the right to live, and the actual man—the farmer, the producer, the laborer—stands here and begs Congress to give him relief.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I sympathize with that demand, and also with the zeal of my honored friend the Senator from South Carolina. I am not going to quarrel with him about his desire to limit this power.

Mr. TILLMAN. I say let us give the people the benefit of the doubt.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I regret that in his zeal for the people the Senator seems to throw a sort of cloud over the good faith and purpose of those who at the expense of a good deal of time and labor have framed these provisions of the proposed statute.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I disclaim any such purpose with regard to the Senator from Iowa or those who are laboring with him to secure relief. I believe he is just as honest and zealous in his efforts to give the country a good law that will bring about a better condition in regard to railroads as I am. I do not claim any monopoly of patriotism or purity here, and if I have said anything to wound his feelings or make him feel that I am suspicious of his integrity of purpose——

Mr. DOLLIVER. Oh, no.

Mr. TILLMAN. I here and now disclaim it. But this Hepburn bill, as I have said, is in my charge; I am trying to feed the brat the best I can and to take care of it. I do not intend that all the railroad lawyers in the United States shall kill it if I can prevent it.

Mr. DOLLIVER. That is a good resolution, but I am having so much trouble defending this bill from its enemies that I would be delighted if I could get a little more charitable consideration of it from its friends. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Perhaps by the time we get some amendments in the bill which will make the brat less obnoxious to some of us and will not make him so obnoxious that his original friends will disown him we may be able to get a majority of Senators who will amend the bill in several particulars, concerning two of which I have already spoken. I will see that they are presented to the Senate later on, but I will not state them now, as it is growing late. I will say to the Senator that I believe he will find at least as much zeal and earnestness of purpose among the friends of the bill on this side as on the other side. It is not a partisan measure, thank God, and I do not want partisanship to enter into it; but I say we will meet any and all men on the other side or anywhere else halfway, and more than halfway, in an effort to give the people relief, instead of, in the words of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], "offering them a stone in place of bread."

Mr. FORAKER. Will not the Senator now, before he takes his seat, tell us what those two amendments are?

Mr. TILLMAN. I have already outlined them, and I will speak of them again. I believe there ought to be incorporated in this bill a provision that no public carrier shall produce for sale and transport, in competition with private parties, coal or other necessaries of life. That is one thing that should go in the bill. There is another that would give relief to the conditions in West Virginia by compelling the through carriers or interstate roads to give connection, physical and otherwise, to grant joint rates, and enable any man who wants to engage in interstate commerce to have an outlet to the market. Those are two provisions I want incorporated in the bill.

Mr. DOLLIVER. The first of those provisions, by reason of a recent decision of the Supreme Court, is now in the law without any amendment. Of course I am in favor of that, but if I understand the decision of the Supreme Court, that is the law now. So far as the other suggestion is concerned, all of those things are at present in the bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. But they are in there in such vague and indefinite terms that I am afraid the Supreme Court would say they were only there by implication, and that court has expressly declared that no power can be given by implication. So I want it provided for in direct terms.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I think this debate has gone far enough, and I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 15, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE CASTOR.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered. That the name of Hon. GEORGE A. CASTOR, late a Member of the House of Representatives from Pennsylvania, be added to the list of memorial services to be held on Sunday, April 15, 1906.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16472—the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative appropriation bill, with Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] such time as he desires.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Georgia rise?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to have an understanding with my colleague over there [Mr. LITTAUER]. Do I understand that the gentleman is going forward on that side, or shall we on this side use some time now?

Mr. LITTAUER. There are one or two requests over here, the gentleman from Wisconsin in particular.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to try to keep the time evenly divided, if possible, as we go along.

Mr. LITTAUER. We, of course, want to do the same. The gentleman from Wisconsin, however, is not very well, and desires an opportunity to be heard at this time, and accordingly I have yielded to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that no provision has been made by the House for the control of the time, and thus far no request has been made to the Chair for time by anybody, except the gentleman from Georgia, on that side of the House.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I believe the understanding was that the gentleman from New York would control the time on that side and that I should control it on this side.

Mr. LITTAUER. I shall have no disposition to take more than half the time, if gentlemen on that side want to occupy it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The question raised by the Chair is that no one has been agreed upon to control the time.

Mr. TAWNEY. There has been no agreement as to the control of the time, and in the absence of an agreement the Chair always controls the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be very glad to alternate between gentlemen on either side of the Hall, if they make requests for time.

Mr. LITTAUER. I have yielded to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, if the statehood bill which has recently passed the House should be enacted into law in the form it left the House, it would, in my opinion, be one of the greatest legislative outrages ever perpetrated in this country. I refer particularly to the proposed merger of Arizona and New Mexico into one State, and I believe that future events would prove it to be a serious mistake. Fortunately for the country, the Senate has amended the bill and stricken out the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico, and as it comes back to the House amended it provides for the admission of Oklahoma and Indian Territories as one State.

I heartily approve this amendment, and at a Republican conference, held early in the session, this proposition was unanimously indorsed by that conference. Not an opposing vote was cast against the proposition that is now presented to us by the Senate.

In my opinion neither Arizona nor New Mexico is at this time ready for statehood. It will be many years before New Mexico reaches the worthy stage which will entitle the people of that Territory to the rights of statehood and give them two votes in the United States Senate, on an equality with Pennsylvania, New York, Illinois, or my own State of Wisconsin. It will not be so long before Arizona is fitted to come into the Union of States, but when she does reach that stage of preparedness every consideration of justice and fair play demands that she shall take her place in the sisterhood in her own right and unhampered by a union which could almost be called miscegenation, with comparatively an alien race. If let alone, Arizona's future is assured and will be glorious. Resources of mineral wealth that hardly have been scratched on the surface; possibilities of agricultural development almost boundless, promise for the Territory growth in the future which will make Arizona one of the richest regions of the West. To yoke her with New Mexico will inevitably stunt her growth, check her development, and make her secondary to a community which does not begin to approach her in worth in any material way.

It is only natural that the people of Arizona should feel themselves entitled to the privileges of statehood and should chafe at being held out of the Union. They are ambitious folk, brothers of yours and mine, coming from all of the States of the East, pushing their fortunes in a new country and desirous of advancing them. They recall that other Territories far less worthy have been admitted, citing Nevada and Utah. They point to the fact that the great Territory of Dakota was divided into two States. Because political considerations in the past may have dictated the admission of other Territories they see no reason why other considerations should not now prevail to obtain for them a like privilege.

But is it not significant that with all this eagerness to secure the coveted prize of statehood, which would mean so much to their material development, nine-tenths of the people of Arizona are willing to defer it, and defer it indefinitely, rather than be drawn into the Union shackled to New Mexico? There are reasons geographical, racial, historical, moral, and I might also say constitutional why this outrage should not be perpetrated upon the people of Arizona. The geographical reason alone should be enough to prohibit the joining of the two Territories into one State. The combined area of New Mexico and Arizona is 235,380 square miles. With the exception of Texas, this would make the State the largest in the Union. When Texas was admitted by treaty it was provided that she should have the privilege of dividing herself at any time into five States. The two Territories are separated by deserts and mountains to a degree which would make physical jointure impossible from a practical view point. The dividing ridge comprises one of the most difficult mountain regions on this continent. Wagon roads and trails, not to speak of railroads, are almost impossible between the settled communities on either side of the Divide. Intercommunication between Arizona and New Mexico will always be difficult. The trade of Arizona goes to Los Angeles and the Pacific coast. The well-to-do people spend their vacations in California. The citizens of New Mexico trade with El Paso, Tex., and Denver, Colo. They rarely go across the Divide to the coast. Consider for a moment some of the difficulties in this country of magnificent distances.

The shortest distance from Santa Fe, N. Mex., to Yuma, Ariz., is 791 miles by rail. From Santa Fe to Phoenix the distance is 661 miles. There is scarcely a town of any importance in Arizona that is nearer to Santa Fe than Boston is to Washington. The traveler consumes twenty-eight hours' constant travel in a journey from Phoenix to Santa Fe, twenty-four hours from Tucson, and thirty-two hours from Yuma. The citizen of Yuma who had business in the capital of the proposed new State would spend fourteen hours longer in the journey than is required to go from New York to Chicago. His railroad fare would be $40.25.

This is not a small item by any means. The expense upon the new State would be very heavy to send members of the legislature to Santa Fe and to pay the cost of transacting all the business of the government which would arise in this vast area. It must not be overlooked that the original reason for the separation of Arizona and New Mexico in 1863 was that the distances between settled communities were so great that the expense of taking part in the government of the Territory was almost prohibitive to the people living in the region now comprised by Arizona.

I desire particularly to call attention to the difference between the classes of people who inhabit the two Territories. In my opinion this racial difference is exceedingly important. Experience has shown that it is not wise to combine two distinct races under one government, where each will be striving for control of the government. The men who have built up Arizona are Americans, natives of the Eastern States. New England and New York are well represented. The Middle States have their quota in the citizenship, and the States of the Mississippi Valley have sent their young men to this rich and growing country. The population is representative of sturdy Americanism in its best form. The bulk of the population in New Mexico is of Spanish origin. Their mode of life, their thought, their customs, and even their local laws are different from those of the residents of Arizona. According to the report of the governor of New Mexico to the Secretary of the Interior for the year 1902, there are eight Spanish-Americans to five of all other races. Governor Otero once expressed the sentiment of a large number of people in New Mexico against joint statehood in the following language:

> There is no doubt that the great majority of people of New Mexico are opposed to joining New Mexico and Arizona into one commonwealth, as proposed by pending legislation. Even a small percentage who would acquiesce in such legislation prefer single and separate statehood for each Territory. This is not due to any innate animosity between the two Territories, but to the inherent differences in population, in legislation, in industries, in contour, in ideals, and from an historical and ethnological standpoint, not to mention that the consolidation of two commonwealths like New Mexico and Arizona into one is unprecedented in American history.
> The new State would be an unnatural and an unwilling alliance. It would be the coercion of two populations which are unlike in character, in ambition, and largely in occupation. The union would be abhorrent to both. Simply because the two populations are in the Southwest the country should not suppose that they are alike or sympathetic.

It passes my comprehension how in face of such solemn warning as this the intelligent American Congress can persist in forcing upon the people of these two Territories an alliance which not only is objected to by both of them, but which it is shown by irrefutable evidence would be productive of nothing but evil. [Applause.] The people of Arizona are more bitterly opposed to the union than the citizens of New Mexico. That is due to the fact that the New Mexico folk realize that in the forced union they would derive some compensation from being in the majority, numerically. They would dominate the situation at all times. They would outvote the Arizona faction on every proposition. It would be as if Connecticut should be joined to New York—Arizona typified by Connecticut.

The legislation contemplated in this bill has been pending since April 4, 1904, when the Hamilton bill, providing for joint statehood between Arizona and New Mexico and Oklahoma and Indian Territory, was brought in. The bill was the result of a compromise among members of the House Committee on Territories, reached without consulting the wishes of the people of either Arizona or New Mexico or of their Delegates in Congress. The first bill was jammed through the House under whip and spur of a rule reported by the Committee on Rules, which limited debate, cut off intervening motions, prohibited amendments, and fixed an hour for a vote.

It failed of enactment at that session of Congress.

As soon as the people of Arizona awoke to realization that there was danger of their being consolidated with New Mexico they began to express their opposition to the proposed legislation. Their disapproval was nearly unanimous. The legislature of Arizona adopted a resolution of protest. Commercial bodies met and objected vigorously, while local officials and private citizens all joined in objection. A delegation from the Territorial Bar Association was sent to Washington to labor with Congress. On May 27, 1905, a convention was held in Phoenix to organize an anti-joint statehood league. Mayors of every city in Arizona, the county boards of supervisors, and various commercial organizations sent delegates. A bipartisan meeting of the campaign committees of the two political parties adopted resolutions. The convention unanimously adopted a set of resolutions which, since, have met with universal approval of the people of the Territory, which declared, in part:

> We profoundly believe that the union of the two Territories as one State would be inimical to the best and highest interests of both, and because of the differences in our history, laws, customs, and races, and because of the geographical division which naturally separate and divide us, such union would be particularly harmful to the people of Arizona. We believe that the complications which would inevitably result from an attempt to adjust impartially the burden of the debts of the Territories and of the various counties and municipalities thereof would result in irreconcilable differences, and that the prosperity and welfare of the various Territorial institutions would be endangered.
> We believe that it would be impossible to adopt such a code of laws as would meet the conditions in each Territory and yet which would be just to the whole people of the proposed State.

The people of Arizona claim that the organic act creating the Territory of Arizona, passed by the Congress during Lincoln's Administration, promised them separate statehood. That act of date of February 24, 1863, provided:

> That said government shall be maintained and continued until such time as the people residing in said Territory shall apply for and obtain admission as a State on an equal footing with the original States.

Former Governor Murphy, of Arizona, an eastern man, once analyzed that declaration:

> This is a distinct promise of ultimate statehood for Arizona within her boundaries. The time when it shall be admitted is left to the discretion of Congress, but the first move must come from the people of Arizona.
> It has been argued that this promise on the part of that Congress can not be binding on any other Congress. Strictly speaking, from a legal standpoint, this is true; but in all fairness and justice we submit that it is not morally right for Congress to force us into this union in the face of our opposition. A large number of the people of Arizona have come here from Eastern States, and with infinite labor they have built up communities which we believe are a credit to the whole country. We have wrested the land from the desert by irrigation; we have sought for and found gold, silver, copper, and other minerals valuable to the development of the industries of the United States; we have invested our capital and our lives in the success of our ventures.
> We are not seeking now for separate statehood, but we believe that our autonomy should be preserved and that we should not be deprived forever of the hope of entering the Union as a State. Not as a tribe of Filipinos in a far distant colony, but as American citizens, we ask that Congress shall preserve our right to self-government and the privilege of working out our own destiny under our own laws and our own institutions, and not place us under the domination of a people who greatly outnumber us and who are widely different in language, in race, in laws, and in ideals.

The principal test as to whether Arizona should remain separate from New Mexico with the expectation of eventually becoming a State, so far as it affects the United States as a whole, is whether the resources of the Territory will bring a population that will convince the whole country of its fitness to take a place among the States of the Union. The citizens of the Territory are so confident that this test will decide the question in the affirmative that they are willing to wait until the development which they expect warrants admission as a separate State. I do not care to go at length into statistics of the resources of Arizona, but I would like to recite a few to refute the statements which have been made about the Territory and the misapprehension which seems to exist.

In 1905 there were more than 11,000,000 acres of land located in tracts. There were nearly 14,000,000 acres of grazing lands on the public domain. There were 26,000,000 acres in Indian and forest reserves. Of the balance of the Territory, consisting of 21,000,000 acres, the greater portion can not be reclaimed, but is marvelously rich in copper, silver, gold, and other minerals. The irrigation projects now in contemplation or under construction by the Federal Government will furnish water for many thousand acres of land which can be reclaimed by irrigation. The pine forests of Arizona cover an area of over 12,000 square miles and the value of Government timber is estimated at $300,000,000. The total yield of gold, silver, and copper from 1870 to 1894 was $156,000,000. Within the succeeding ten years the gold and silver output amounted to nearly $56,000,000, notwithstanding the great depreciation in the price of silver, and the production of copper to $120,000,000. The total farm products in 1899 amounted to $10,000,000 and the live stock was valued at $15,000,000. There is not the slightest doubt that Arizona, at her present rate of development, within ten years will be ready to claim by right membership in the sisterhood of States.

Before I close I would like to refute one charge that has been made in the course of this contest against joint statehood. It has been alleged as an ulterior motive for opposition that if statehood is defeated railroad and mining corporations will be permitted to enjoy continued immunity from adequate taxation under Territorial law. Only one answer is necessary to that: If Arizona remains a Territory the Congress of the United States has the power at all times and any time to regulate taxation in the Territory, and if the system is wrong Congress can change it. [Applause.]

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LITTAUER. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] such time as he desires.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak briefly upon the topic in the pending bill relating to the administration of the civil service of the Government. I am not surprised at the condition that we find in the country. I am free to say that the condition has come a little more rapidly and is a little more serious than I had myself anticipated years ago. I am taken by surprise at the magnitude of the evil existing, and while I do not care to say in the ordinary language, "I told you so," I want to point out that the difficulty does not lie in the conditions sought to be remedied by the provision in this bill.

The fact exists, and has existed for many years, that the cost of the administration of the Government through the instrumentalities controlled by the Civil Service Commission is the cause of one of the largest deficits in our public revenue. We are complaining here about expenditures, and we are afraid to appropriate money for the building of public buildings; we are becoming careful of the appropriations for the naval establishment, and honest hands are held up in holy horror at the idea of passing a ship subsidy bill which will put into the Treasury more money than it will take out in two years, and will not take out of the Treasury in ten years one-half of the money that is wasted on the civil administration of this Government in any one year of its existence. That is the sort of administration of affairs that has grown up in this country. The distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee shows that we pay $134,000,000 for clerical work alone, and no one doubts that one-fourth of all this can be saved if we can place our whole administration upon a business basis.

Not very long ago an Assistant Postmaster-General made the statement before one of the committees of the House that he could grow rich annually if he could be paid 40 per cent of the cost of running that institution in the city of Washington and allow him to do the work through his own process and agency.

Now, for the first time, a great committee of the House of Representatives, carefully investigating the whole subject, has come here with the most startling proposition, a proposition that it may be will be slurred over at this time—it may be there will come directly a protest in the form of personal detraction against the Members of the House of Representatives because of their attitude upon this question—but, in the long run, Mr. Chairman, it is absolutely certain that something will have to be done, somebody will have to do it, and the cry of "spoilsman" upon the one hand and the "merit system" upon the other hand will not very much longer dazzle the eyes of the American people upon the one hand and drive them to substantial hysteria on the other.

The effort being made by the Committee on Appropriations is an honest effort to meet a terrible condition of affairs and to cure it if possible, and my position is that they are upon the wrong track, or, in other words, they are on the track that leads to the central trouble in the matter, and that this proceeding—this proposition of theirs which will be temporarily of some benefit—will never cure the evil that we are laboring under. It is like cutting off twigs at the top of a dying tree in order to stimulate growth of the bole of the tree in the ground. It is going up into the branches when the evil resides down at the root of the tree.

The so-called "merit system" was introduced by a Democratic Senator in the Senate of the United States in 1883, who boldly proclaimed that he had done it and was doing it in order that he could force some Democrats into the minor offices of the Government. During the progress of the debate upon that bill Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, than whom there was probably no man in the United States more devoted to real merit in the offices of the Government, said that he would vote for the measure, but that he considered it a crude and tentative measure. I do not attempt to give his exact words, but that was the substance of what he said. He said it would be a starting point from which wise legislation doubtless might grow up. That was in 1883. From that day to this that crude measure, admitted to be so by its friends, has stood upon the statute book of the United States. Hundreds of bills have been introduced—the outgrowth of wisdom that has come to the American Congress as time passed on. Hundreds of bills to repeal the law, to amend the law, to get rid of the evils resulting from the law—in all directions changes and amendments have been sought for.

Every one of these bills have been sent to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service. And, strange as it may appear to a Congressman, not one of them was ever reported out. You talk about "sitting on the lid;" if ever there was a "lid" that was fastened down and strangled the intelligence of the American Congress on this mighty question, it was the lid that has been sat upon by the Committee on Civil Service Reform of this House of Representatives since 1883, for not one bill was ever brought out.

Nobody has yet dared—and I use the word without qualification—to trust the American Congress with the right to legislate upon this vital question. Sometimes we have expressed the opinion of Congress—always the opinion of dissatisfaction—by voting temporarily against the appropriation for the pay of the Civil Service Commission. Every day the friends of this strangulation proceeding have twitted us with the remark that we were trying to do an idle and foolish thing, and over and over again, for twenty years, we have begged of that committee, "Give us an opportunity and we will show you." And what has been the answer to all that we have said? They said, "You are spoilsmen; you are in favor of strangling reform; you claim that you ought to have the power to corrupt and vitiate the public places of the country." There has been no argument upon our part, no opportunity to express our views, and we have been met only with the simple blatant, absurd, ridiculous, and brutal cry of "spoilsmen," which has come up from certain gentlemen of the intense mugwump persuasion.

There never was a Congressman since I have been a Member of this House who ever sought to restore the system that has been called by the opprobrious name of "the spoils system." Each and every utterance that has pursued many of us has been the utterance of the libeler—the shameless libeler of men who have dared in actual debate to express themselves upon this question. No Congressman in twenty years, so far as I remember, has introduced a bill to return to the "spoils system," but we have sought to have an opportunity to stay this tide that to-day has been described by both sides of this House—by the chairman of the subcommittee on our side and by the distinguished leader of the minority of the committee on the other side.

What is the underlying, fundamental principle of this system? Life tenure of office, and every trouble that the gentleman here before me from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] has described, and which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] has repeated, harks back to the irresponsible condition of an employee of the Government holding a life position. Now comes the report that there are 585 who are above the age of 70 years in the offices of the various Departments here in this city whom they can not or will not get rid of. Well, I do not want to get rid of them myself, and I certainly shall not vote to strike down the man whose only fault is his age. I would place myself in a most remarkable position if I should vote that a man ought not to earn more than $1,000 or $850 a year simply because his offense, and his sole offense, was that he was over 70 years of age. I am not proud of my consistency, and yet I am not so glaringly inconsistent as that. Now, what is the real trouble? I have said that it is life tenure. The experiment has been tried in other countries. What country has a civil pension? No Christian country ever upheld life tenure without a civil-pension list, and to that crisis we are rapidly coming.

If you keep men in office until they become 70 years of age and upward and become worthless, or comparatively so, if there is humanity in the Government we must create a vast civil-pension list, and that list must go on and grow—grow as this list is growing. What will be the effect now of lopping off the proportion of these clerks that is proposed by the processes of this bill? Why, you would turn back and dissipate the billows and the waves that are crushing out decent reform here for a year or two years, but it will keep coming, coming from the boundless resources of life tenure of office. This Government is founded upon the idea of rotation in office, and, as the gentleman from Georgia very well said, we have to go before a competitive campaign every two years and the President every four years and the Senators every six years, and all through our whole mighty system of free government the idea of limited term of office is the controlling principle, and yet there is ejected into this Government a principle that is diametrically and wholly and utterly opposed to the principle thus involved.

Now, I have said, Mr. Chairman, no man on this floor or in this House for twenty years has ever attempted, so far as I can remember, to go back to what is called the "spoils system." There is only just this much spoils system left in this country, and that undoubtedly will be wiped out in due time, and the Civil Service Commission, with their bugology and astronomy and chemistry, will operate on those lines. Thus far there has been left to the intelligence and patriotism and wisdom of the American Congressman the primary nomination of cadets at West Point and midshipmen at Annapolis, and it must be said that out of the product of these Congressmen's wisdom and patriotism there has come some pretty good men to the front in America. Phil Sheridan was appointed in the district I represnt—a little Irish boy carrying water to his father's men working on a canal contract—by the recommendation of a Congressman. He could not have passed a civil-service examination for an elevator in one of these public buildings. Ulysses S. Grant was sent from Ohio by old Hamar; and so on all along the line. And George Dewey and Schley and Sampson, and coming on down, all the way down through the magnificent galaxy of men who have distinguished themselves and not disgraced themselves, this Government has been in its military arm represented by the spoils system. It has all gone but that, and that is as rapidly going as possible, for Congressmen now will find out that there is a very earnest suggestion made every time you nominate a cadet or midshipman that you send him before the Civil Service Commission. I have said, and I stand by it, that the opinion of this House, that has been so often expressed and so nearly unanimously expressed, has never been in favor of overthrowing all that is valuable in the civil-service system of the United States. I would scorn to hold myself up as a man who desired to go back to the situation that Congressmen might nominate and appoint, as it were, clerks in the Departments here in Washington. Nobody has ever thought of it, but it has been taken up and falsely and viciously and wickedly and criminally and libelously hurled at the men who have stood here and fairly sought an opportunity to present to the American people their views upon the subject. I say no man in the twenty years of my service here has ever uttered such a proposition as that, and yet constantly and everywhere we have been traduced in this way.

Now, Mr. Chairman, some years ago, in the Fifty-fifth Congress, when the troubles that are now so rapidly before us were coming in every direction wise men saw that something must be done, something ought to be done so this disgraceful condition would be arrested, and after a considerable consultation something over 100 Members of this House on the Republican side held conferences one after the other and discussed as fully as possible the views of each Member as to what ought to be done with the civil service of the Government. I have said that these evils had been prophetically declared, and in order to present our views, to assure the American people that the so-called "spoilsmen" of the House of Representatives had never dreamed of any proceedings such as were being characterized, finally, after full discussion, we prepared a bill which was introduced by Mr. Evans, of Kentucky, now judge of the United States district court, and in order that I may have a starting point, and in order that I may check if possible this tidal wave of misrepresentation, I desire to have the bill read at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5854) to modify an act entitled "An act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States," approved January 16, 1883, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the rules heretofore made and promulgated, or which may hereafter be made or promulgated, under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States," approved January 16, 1883, shall not apply to nor regulate examinations for nor the employment or appointment of any person to any office or position in the civil service of the United States, nor to removals therefrom, except the following, namely:

First, clerks (which term shall also include copyists, counters, computers, and draftsmen) who receive salaries of not less than $900 nor over $1,800 per annum in the several Departments, institutions, commissions, and bureaus in the city of Washington, D. C., and in the various public offices throughout the country in which as many as twenty-five persons, exclusive of letter carriers, are employed; second, railway mail clerks, and, third, letter carriers in cities where more than ten carriers, exclusive of substitutes, are employed: Provided, That the provisions of said act approved January 16, 1883, and rules made thereunder, shall not in any way apply nor be applied to the appointment or employment of special examiners in the Bureau of Pensions, nor to confidential clerks, secretaries, or stenographers of any head of any Department, institution, commission, or bureau, nor to those of any postmaster, surveyor, or collector of customs, collector of internal revenue, pension agent, appraiser of merchandise, the naval officer of any port, marshal of any district, or attorney of the United States for any district, nor to any person employed in the office of the Public Printer.

SEC. 2. That so far as said act can be construed to authorize the prescribing of rules for employments or appointments to or removals from any other position in the public service, except as provided in this act, the same is hereby repealed, and all rules which have been adopted or promulgated inconsistent with this act are hereby annulled and rescinded.

SEC. 3. That the terms of office for all persons to whose appointment the rules made or to be made under said act of January 16, 1883, may apply shall be five years from the passage of this act, and the terms of those hereafter appointed to be five years from the date of their respective appointments: Provided, That the provisions of this section of this act shall not in any manner abridge or interfere with the power of the proper appointing officers to reappoint, remove, transfer, reduce, or promote any such appointee, person, employee, or clerk in his discretion and as a proper regard for the good of the public service may, in his judgment, require: And provided further, That when any such clerk, employee, person, or appointee is removed, transferred, or reduced, the officer ordering or doing the same shall state in writing the reason and grounds therefor, and shall file such writing as a public record in his office: And provided further, That no such removal, reduction, promotion, or transfer shall be made for political or religious reasons.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, Mr. Chairman, that was the opinion, as well as we could agree upon it, of the hundred and odd Members of the House of Representatives who prepared that bill. They were, some of them, very distinguished Members of this House, men of long service and of careful study on this vital question. And the object, and the only object, that we had was to adopt an amendment to this system, not to destroy the merit features of the system, not in any manner to get rid of an examination as to fitness, but simply to get rid of the curse of the civil administration—life tenure. That is all there was of it. The bill was not perfect. It was not understood to be perfect. But the bill was a suggestion, a guideboard and warning that the rocks and shoals and the breakers that we are upon now were a short distance in the front. What became of that bill thus brought in here by the united wisdom of more than a hundred Members of the House of Representatives? What do you think became of it? A shout went up from one end of the country to the other by the organs of bureaucracy that we were trying to go back to the old spoils system, and the Committee on Civil Service Reform took that bill, indorsed as it was by more than a hundred Members of this House, and, if they did not swear to it, they acted upon it, that we should never see it again, and we never did. They would not let us look at it. They would not bring it into the House, for that or some bill of a similar character would have passed in that House by an overwhelming majority.

What is the fundamental idea of that bill? It is to appoint the clerks—the minor places, the men who do the actual work in the Departments at Washington—for a limited period of time upon certain examination that the Department to which he was assigned should see fit to make, and then at the end of five years the term would expire. It might have been four; it might have been six. It was a suggestion of a vital principle, and it was a suggestion that would have saved us from the disgrace under which we are living to-day.

The gentleman from Georgia, whose argument yesterday I fully appreciated, is a little mistaken in one idea that he has, in my judgment. He places too high an estimate upon the question of experience of the clerk. How long do you think it would take a graduate of one of our high schools or a farmer's boy, with a log-schoolhouse education, to learn to be an efficient clerk in one of these Departments, in one of the minor places? One day would make him efficient. Show him the tools he is to use and show him what he has to do; and it is a mistake to suppose that an American young man is incompetent without long training. That has been one of the faults of this system, holding it out here through all these years that there was something occult in these Departments, something that required some enormous training, some great skill, and all these educational developments.

Again, Mr. Chairman, no greater injury can be done to nine out of ten of the young men of this country than to give them a place in one of the Governmental Departments and say to him "You are appointed for life." [Applause.] I know something about that, and I speak with more than ordinary feeling upon that point, and many of you know to what I particularly refer. If you will take an American young man with a fair, common-school education, and give him a position in the city of Washington in one of these Departments for four or five years it will benefit him. It will give him an introduction and an interest in what is going on, give him an opportunity for a broader view of the horoscope of American life, and American politics, and American Government; but when you put him there under a life-time appointment, I tell you nine out of ten—now that is a fair estimate—nine out of ten have become automatic machines, expecting to live here in the city of Washington all their lifetime, and then, having the place be firmly rooted in it, his study is to do just as little as possible and live along this, his life work.

Now, you say there is nothing to hinder a young man to go out of one of these places after having these opportunities of observation of which I have spoken. That is true. How many will do it? He has got to go out in two, four, or six years, and look about him, and he will say in a few years I have got to get out from here, I have got to hunt a place somewhere and somehow by which I can grow up into business importance.

So he will stay on, and on, and on. And, Mr. Chairman, if there is a more pitiable object on the face of the earth, to me, I do not know it, than an old superannuated clerk, with a threadbare suit and straggling gray hair and trembling form who is hanging on at his desk because there is no place for him to go. And he has become to all intents and purposes a pensioner, inadvertent to himself and inadvertent to the Government, a pensioner upon the Treasury of the United States. We are asked to turn him out. It is not the fault of the clerk who has grown old under the inducements that have been held out to him by the Government. He has been assured that he is there under a life tenure; there under the "merit system." Some considerable number of years ago two young men in the district I represent competed for a position. One of them secured the place over his competitor by a marking of about one and one-half in a hundred. The fortunate man is to-day a clerk at about $900 or $1,000 a year, with a family, a wife and children, and it is a great struggle for him to make a living. The other young fellow, who met me after his rejection, with almost tears in his eyes, is to-day an active manager in a wholesale business house in the county in which he lives at a salary four times as great as the clerk, and with an interest in the business. That is but a fair illustration.

Now, if this young man who was appointed, at the end of four or five years, had gone home with the additional learning he had got, the additional and wider observation of things he had got, then, doubtless, he would have been in a far better position than he is to-day. But you say the Government ought to have these skilled men. That was the argument of the gentleman from Georgia. Examine that bill that the builders refused, that the Jewish builders hid in their impenetrable, mysterious place of hiding [laughter], and you will find that there is the greatest possible privilege to the Government to reappoint. Then it becomes a true merit system. Give a young fellow an opportunity in four or five years and then say to the Government, "Now you can turn this man out without any detriment to his standing; let him go home; or, if you see fit, and you find that he is worth it, and want him, you can reappoint him at once."

There is the merit system; and the examination is not made before schoolmasters and scientists, but it is made in the crucial test of actual experiment, of labor performed, of work done, in the arduous accomplishment of things achieved. That is the place where his examination comes from, and then the opportunity to promote him, to send him up along the line of promotion, is right within the power of the head of the Department to which he belongs. This is the true civil service, and it is not the cry of the spoilsman. I do not believe that many of the men of this country in public life, who feel as I feel about this subject, that any two, or five of them at the most, would send the country back to the beginning of 1883, and to the place where we were before.

So, Mr. Chairman, my argument is not for the repeal of the civil-service law. It is not for the abrogation of the principle of competitive value in the public service; but it is a single proposition. Repeal the idea of life tenure in these offices, and you have cured the whole evil.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is a good deal to ask of a soldier who served four years and a half, or nearly so, and who has seen around him these comrades of the battlefield from both the South and the North in these public places, there by no fault of theirs, legislated against. I can not vote for such a proposition as that. There is ample opportunity in this bill, I agree, to except from the sweeping purview of the law the men who have earned positions by reason of their service in the Army. And let us see now what is the record of the country—not alone of the Republican party, but of the country—upon this question. And I desire to say right here now that upon every one of these questions that involve favors to the soldiers of the Union Army, the gallant men of the South on this floor who served in the war, who are getting to be very few here now, have always stood favorable to the men who fought on the other side.

Now, let us see what we did. Away back we placed in the statute books the following:

SEC. 754. Persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in line of duty shall be preferred for appointments to civil offices, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices.

SEC. 1755. In grateful recognition of the services, sacrifices, and suffering of persons honorably discharged from the military and naval service of the country, by reason of wounds, disease, or the expiration of terms of enlistment, it is respectfully recommended to bankers, merchants, manufacturers, mechanics, farmers, and persons engaged in industrial pursuits to give them the preference for appointment to remunerative situations and employment.

Now, later on we had a bill here, in 1903, seeking further to benefit these discharged soldiers, and I read now from a statement made only yesterday by a distinguished member of the Grand Army of the Republic. This bill went to the Committee on Civil Service Reform, and by a process little short of what is usually known in surgery as "Cæsarean" we dragged it out of that committee and brought it into this House and passed it by an overwhelming majority.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Right there I want to make an inquiry for the purpose of getting some information. I have noticed that a number of the States have permitted soldiers to be employed under civil-service laws in the State governments. Of course, those soldiers get old just as much as those employed under the Federal Government. Can the gentleman from Ohio inform the committee what the several States, or any of them, have done when such soldiers have become so old as to be absolutely inefficient? Possibly the gentleman can shed some light on the subject.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can only speak for the State in which I live. I know nothing about the personnel of the employees of States anywhere else. As long as it has been possible to do anything for them in the way of holding these positions they have been kept in there, and when they were too old they have been sent, if they were indigent, to a State Soldiers' Home that we have.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Have we not Federal Soldiers' Homes?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Plenty of them; but while that is a great charity, and one for which I have nothing but the highest honor and respect, I had little rather that my comrade of the northern army and my friend of the southern army should live somehow at home and outside of a public institution. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Of course, if he has a home and can maintain himself; but suppose he gets so old that it is impossible for him to do the work?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, Mr. Chairman, to proceed, in March, 1903, there was taken from the House Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, against the vigorous protest of the chairman, the only measure so honored during the late lamented Speaker Henderson's term, the bill to amend section 1754 of the Revised Statutes so as to apply the provision to all honorably discharged soldiers and sailors, both in matter of appointment and retention in the civil service. To show what the feeling of the House was, under a suspension of the rules this bill was passed by an overwhelming majority. Recollect that this was a bill that found its way into the committee I have been talking about and was taken by—as my friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] would say—by the scruff of the neck and dragged out of the committee against its protest, a very summary proceeding in the House of Representatives. Under a suspension of the rules the bill was passed by an overwhelming majority of the House and sent to the Senate, where it failed only by reason of the confusion in the closing hours of Congress. If we had got it out a little earlier, it would have been passed and become a law.

I will read it. Chapter 287, act approved August 15, 1876 (p. 120, Sup. Rev. Stat.), reads:

* * * Provided, That in making any reduction of force in any of the Executive Departments the head of such Department shall retain those persons who may be equally qualified who have been honorably discharged from the military or naval service of the United States and the widows and orphans of deceased soldiers and sailors.

With the following order by the President, with which all of us are familiar:

The attention of the Departments is hereby called to the provisions of the laws giving preference to veterans in appointment and retention.

The President desires that whenever the needs of the service will justify it and the laws will permit preference shall be given alike in appointment and retention to honorably discharged veterans of the civil war who are fit and qualified to perform the duties of the places which they seek or are filling.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 17, 1902.

There speaks the exact sentiment, in my judgment, of the American people. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have but a few more suggestions to make. What is the attitude of the Committee on Appropriations here now on this bill? How do they stand now to the House of Representatives in view of their recommendation? Well, my judgment is, Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding all the criticism that is being made, that if they had done any less than they have done in this behalf, they would have fallen short of the high duty they owe to the country and to the House of Representatives that they represent. They have come to us with the facts. They have come here with an unvarnished history and statement of conditions, and it is left to the House of Representatives to make an effort to remedy this evil by some process that shall meet with the approval of the wisdom of the House of Representatives and trusting to the patriotism of the country to approve.

We can not go on in this way any longer, Mr. Chairman. If this House and this party does not take hold of this evil so graphically described by this committee, the country will take hold of this party and this House. The country will not stand any longer for the distribution of this enormous fund in this city and throughout the country while the intelligent, the patriotic members of the committee thus lay before the country a situation like this.

Mr. GRAFF. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. GRAFF. I wish to say, and I think I can say it for the committee of which I am a new member, that they desire to present this evil, of such great importance and of such great proportions, to the House, and we desire to have the House discuss this matter and express its views on the subject. I would like to ask the gentleman what he thinks of the suggestion that has been made of conferring upon the Civil Service Commission the power and duty of passing upon the question of the efficiency of each clerk, and recommending the dropping of that clerk when facts demonstrate that he has reached a point where he is inefficient?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, Mr. Chairman, there is no occasion for anything of that character. I do not want to be placed here on record as suggesting or approving of the extension of the power of the Civil Service Commission, or of its reduction or abolition. This question has got beyond that one. It has got into an acute condition—one that demands heroic remedies, and they ought to be applied.

Mr. GRAFF. The trouble seems to be, if the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. GRAFF. To find a branch of the executive government which has the nerve to perform its duty in individual cases. The ideal remedy would be to drop the clerk when he reached the inefficient point. That is the ideal remedy; but where can we find a portion of the executive department of the Government which can be safely charged with that duty with the assurance that it will be performed?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I can not speak for the executive department of the Government, but it is enough for me to say—with all due respect—that I asked the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] if there was no power anywhere by which this evil might have been gotten rid of step by step and he said there was not, and we know there is not. What is the use of hunting around to confer some power upon somebody else?

Why confer it upon a board that is built upon the fundamental error of this whole situation? I believe, Mr. Chairman—and I say it without any attempt at flattery of anybody—that there has been no exigency which has arisen in this country since the fatal day of September, 1901, when an evil has been brought directly to the knowledge of the President of the United States that he has not acted. Sometimes we say he acts too quickly and too vigorously. Here is an opportunity for him to act, and the American people will say, "You can not act too vigorously nor too quickly." How can he act? Fortunately the civil service does not forbid him from changing his Cabinet officers, and he does not have to have a civil-service examiner to certify to the Secretary of the Navy or the Secretary of the Treasury or to the Attorney-General. There is a little latitude yet left to the President of the United States which has not been absorbed by this all-absorbing organization, and if Theodore Roosevelt will say to the heads of those Departments just exactly what he has said upon many other occasions, "This is the right thing; you go and do it," it will be done, and I have confidence in him that when the report and the discussion which will follow reaches him he will easily adapt himself to the emergency.

So much I have said upon this question. I do not know what the proposition of the committee may be. I can not vote for the indiscriminate discharge of these old comrades of mine. I can not do it without discrediting my own self in my own estimation, and that is one of the worst things that any man can possibly do toward himself; but if some proposition can be submitted that will be practical, and that involves as little of cruelty as possible, it is the duty of the American people to rise to the occasion and aid the Committee on Appropriations to get rid of this great evil. What that may be I do not undertake to go into details about; but at last this trouble will be solved and it will not be solved by calling names, it will not be solved by Pharisees, it will not be solved by the men who cast obloquy upon those who differ with them. It will not do to trust the men who believe that they are better than anybody else. Those are the worst men in the world. It will not do to trust the men who impugn every other man's motives. Let us have the application of practical business affairs in the affairs of our Government and save it from the condition that we are now in. [Prolonged applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], but understands that the gentleman from Tennessee has yielded to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. Chairman, I was busy in the subcommittee of Appropriations when I was told that it might be the last opportunity for me to hear my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] pay his annual compliments to the committee of which I am the chairman, the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service. I wish to say for myself that nobody will regret more than I the fact that the gentleman can not annually still entertain, if not enlighten, us upon this as well as other subjects. I did not hear him begin, but when I came in he was charging the committee of which I am the chairman with making as their only defense against his charge a denunciation of him as a "spoilsman." Now, since I have been chairman of that committee, and it is certainly half a dozen years, I am sure the gentleman will admit that I have never made that charge against him or those who sympathize with him.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, in the hurry of debate I may not have differentiated the gentleman, who has always fulfilled his office with gentleness, from some of the others who have poured out their vituperation upon the Members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I was going to say that I do not remember any other Members of the House who have used that style of language. The gentleman spoke of the "organs" of the Civil Service Commission. Why, Mr. Chairman, if there is one Executive Department of this Government that has not any friends or patronage or organ it certainly is the Civil Service Commission; and when the gentleman says that we do not debate the subject he must certainly have forgotten a few years ago, when this House gave up one solid week to debate—debate as without any purpose or hope of legislation—but merely that we might all express our views. And I am always ready to debate and discuss the question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. When we discussed that—as you say, so long—did we have the data before the House that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] has brought before it, touching upon the incapacity of a great number of employees to perform their duty?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Of course, we did not have that data. That was several years ago, and a good deal of that data was not in existence then.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If the gentleman will indulge me, it seems that your committee has had a bill before it touching upon this very evil.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, what was the judgment of your committee; and if you did not come to any judgment, what was your judgment then, and what is it now?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. That committee reported a bill last session upon this subject, which provided that clerks should retire at 70 years of age. It was on the Calendar of the last Congress, but was not privileged, and was never reached.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not going into a general discussion of this subject or occupy the time of this House in defending the general principle of our civil service. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], I am happy to say, agrees that that general principle ought to be maintained. For myself, in maintaining that general principle, I do not now and I never have contended it produced perfect results; but my claim is that as an alternative it is so much better than the old patronage system that no man—and I am glad to see the gentleman from Ohio admits it—would like to go back to the old; and therefore the one question directly before the House now, or before the country, is, How shall we improve the present system? As far as I know, the one charge against it to-day is not that it is not infinitely better than the old system or any other system that has been suggested, but that it leads to the retention of old men in office, and the amendment my friend from New York has brought in in this appropriation bill is to remedy that. As I stated, the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service last Congress brought in a similar bill, but of course it was not privileged and not acted upon. I wish to say for myself I do not think this is at all the ideal method of meeting this subject. I do not believe to say every man shall go out at a certain age is the best method; but here again the question before the House is, What is the practical method of treating the obvious abuses? Is it possible to have any other? Is there some better method? The fault certainly is not with the law, because the law to-day allows any executive officer at any time to dispense with the services of any clerk, and if the executive officers to-day would do their duty when a clerk was inefficient they would and ought to displace him, regardless of his age, so the execution of the law would be perfect, and everyone would admit that the law effected just what was wanted; but the trouble is, officers who are heads of Executive Departments are human; they are not perfect, and they do not execute the law. A few years ago this House of Representatives recognized the danger, and, finding that some Departments were indirectly pensioning old men, we put on an appropriation bill a provision commanding every head of an Executive Department to discharge clerks who had become incompetent; yet the heads of the Departments have come before the House committees and boldly said they would not execute that law, and Members of this House have frequently justified them in that position. Why, I remember one of the heads of the Departments telling me that he was willing and expected to execute the law, but that one of the prominent Members of the House who had favored the new provision came up to him and said: "There is one man on your list who must not go out."

Now, this head of the Department said the very man who ought to go out before all others, the man who headed his list of incompetents, was this very man whom the Member of Congress said he must not discharge, and he said, "If this Member, who professes himself in favor of this very provision, comes and insists that this one chief incompetent should not be discharged, it is impossible for me to carry out that provision of the law." I suppose that is the trouble with all the heads of the Departments. I suppose if we were heads of Departments we would find that same trouble, because, as one of the chiefs of bureaus has recently said, the more incompetent a man is the more influence he is apt to have behind him.

And the most incompetent men are the men who can bring most influential pressure to bear on the heads of Departments to retain them. Consequently the heads of Departments will not live up to their duty, and therefore it is that Congress must act. As I said, I do not think that is the best way to act. I was in favor last year, in my committee, of a simple provision, that every Department of the Government shall every year discharge a certain percentage of its force. It might be a very small percentage—say 1 per cent. If we would provide that every Department of the Government should every year discharge a small percentage of its force, and discharge the men who by the efficiency record stood the lowest, I think that would remove this abuse. That would make every year a certain exodus from the Departments. It would cause every clerk to have some stimulus to do well and not to stand at the bottom. It would improve the whole Department, and it would remedy this abuse.

There are one or two so-called pension schemes which I believe in and which I prefer to this crude and harsh provision, but the rest of my committee did not agree with me, and, therefore, it seems to me there is nothing feasible before us to remedy the abuse except to accept this one proposition that is before the House, and when a person attains a certain age, to drop him.

Now, that, of course, is not scientific; that leads to injustice and hardship. There will be, of course, men of the specified age who are competent and ought to stay, but all legislation of this kind must deal with averages; it must deal with general classes and not with individuals, and, therefore, although it will work hardships, it certainly will effect the end which we are aiming at.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] said that this superannuation was a great abuse and if we did not do something both the country and party would suffer for it. Well, if it is a great abuse, it is worth while remedying, even at the expense of some individual suffering. We may sympathize with them, but it seems to me the end to be accomplished is far greater than the misfortune or unfairness which will accompany it.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS]?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks it is exactly a square deal to examine people for their fitness when they enter under civil service and then to drop them at 70 years of age, irrespective of any examination or any fitness they may still have which would entitle them to remain in the service? Is that exactly a fair deal?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I think it is perfectly fair to say to every man when he goes into the service, that when he gets to 70 years of age he will have to get out of it. I think that is fair.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. The service is founded on competency, and they are examined to prove that they are competent when they enter, and why should they not be retained as long as they are competent?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Theoretically, as I already said, they should be retained. It is the ideal system. That is the law to-day. To-day the law is that just as soon as they are incompetent they shall be dropped, but the law is not enforced. If the gentleman can suggest any way by which that law will be enforced, I will agree with him that it is the best plan.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. You should have an examination to turn them out the same as you have to take them in.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. We have got a better plan than such an examination now. The law is that the head of the Department, who knows of their incompetency, shall turn them out to-day, but he does not do it. That is better than an examination, because he has had the experience of watching them for years in his Department, and he knows better than any examination will tell whether they are competent. The gentleman's theory is quite right, of course.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. The gentleman says that it is entirely different from the Army and Navy, because when a man is retired there on age he is retired with a pension of two-thirds pay. Here you get the best out of a man all his years, and then you drop him out without any compensation and throw him on the charity of the world.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I will agree that theoretically that is right. But let me say further that this appeal does not weigh very strongly with me—namely, that you are throwing a man out on the world when he is 70 years of age, after he has worked for the Government all his years, because all of these Department clerks are paid 50 per cent more than they could have gotten anywhere else. They have been treated with indulgence, and it seems to me it is fair to say to them when they get to the age of 70 they must understand that that ends their departmental life.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the gentleman think that perhaps the actual cure of all this trouble will be a fixed tenure of office—a long one, perhaps—and a provision in the law that at the expiration of that fixed time a man should go out unless reappointed, and that he would not be reappointed except for some excellence in the service?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I have considered that problem. It has certainly much of argument in its favor, but I have concluded that it is not the best way. We can see how easy it would be for reappointments to be made, and it would become a mere perfunctory reappointment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. You might prevent that by adding to a fixed term reexamination at the end of the period by this non-partisan body that has about it nothing of the favoritism which of course is exercised by executive officers at the request of Senators and Representatives. The incumbent thus would not be eligible for reappointment unless he showed a certain degree of excellence, a superior degree of excellence to that which he had on entering the service.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. That does not seem to me the best remedy, because there would be a great probability of favoritism in the appointment, or else they would become merely perfunctory reappointments, and the whole law would amount to nothing at all. The only criticism made to-day is that the clerks become incompetent because of age. If it is a fair criticism, I do not see why this proposition does not remedy it, and whereas there will be cases of individual hardship at first I do not feel that on the whole it is unfair to clerks, who have come here and been paid much more than they would be paid in other similar branches of civil life, that when they get to the age of 65 they shall have their salaries reduced and at 70 years shall leave the service.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am trying to find out what is the condition in the several States in this kind of a case. I will ask, in your State of Massachusetts, whether a soldier who has been working for the State government under the civil-service law, who has reached the age of 70 and should become wholly inefficient because of age, is he discharged, and if he is discharged what becomes of him?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not know. I do not think we have any regulation as to discharge on account of age.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is he discharged when he gets to be 70 years of age?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. We have no age limit of discharge.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What do you do with an employee in the civil service in your State when he becomes physically unable to attend to the affairs of his office?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I assume that he is discharged when he can not perform his duties.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I asked the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], and he informed me that they had Soldiers' Homes where they could go and live.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Of course we have soldiers' aid all over our State, but it is only a small proportion of these who were soldiers.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But because he was a soldier he is given preference, and we want to take care of him because he was a soldier, against a man who has not been a soldier.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman if the civil service has not been extended away beyond what the original law contemplated?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. That has been freely discussed. I do not know whether it has or not. I suspect some people contemplated it and a great many did not.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman's opinion as to this particular matter of reform in the service, as to whether it should have regard to the heads of subdivisions in the classified service, and especially the subject of limitation without regard to length of service or merit either?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I have always been one that differed with a great many others on that. I believe these higher branches ought not to be put in the civil service and ought not to stand on the same footing as the lower branches. When you know that the executive capacity is the most important of the characteristics of a man's service, that class ought to be left out of competitive appointment.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Is it the opinion of the gentleman that this law is never enforced by reason of the chiefs of divisions not doing their duty as they should do it?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I think it is not the chiefs of divisions, it is the heads of the Departments who do not do their duty.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think it was stated here yesterday, or I understood it was, that it was the heads of the divisions—perhaps it was stated the heads of the Departments and I did not catch it accurately.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I will have to differ with the gentleman. I do not think the head of the division has the power or has charge of the responsibility of discharging the inefficient man. It is upon the head of the Department, and it is the duty of the head of the Department to find out the men who are incompetent to discharge their respective duties.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. But under the system the chiefs of the divisions of the Departments have much to do with it, and they have to inform the heads of the Departments with regard to the several clerks in their particular divisions as to their efficiency, and so forth.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Unquestionably. At the same time it seems to me that under the law of Congress it is the duty of the heads of Departments to find out, as they easily could from the heads of divisions, the incompetent men and to obey the law and discharge them. They do not do it, and I should put the responsibility on the heads of Departments.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Do I understand that under the law at present a man may be discharged for inefficiency without charges being preferred against him?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly. That rule, you know, about a hearing and trial was dispensed with or changed by President Roosevelt.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Just recently?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. By President Roosevelt some time ago.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Within the last year?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I think so; yes.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Will the gentleman permit? I understand, of course, that under the law and perhaps under the rulings of the Executive a clerk may be discharged without any cause being shown; but, as a matter of fact, do they not require, except where some emergency necessitates such discharge, that cause be shown?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Does not who require it?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Does not the executive department—does not the President require it?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. No; the President certainly does not. Very likely the head of a Department would require his head of a division to give him a reason before he would discharge a clerk. I should hope he would. It seems to me that is reasonable; but all the head of a Department has to do is to say that a man is incompetent. He can instantly be discharged, and he need not even say that.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. May I ask the gentleman another question? The gentleman being an advocate of the present civil-service law, what objection does he see to making the modification suggested by the gentleman from Ohio—that is to say, a tenure of office so far as clerks in the Government service are concerned?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I, personally, think the present system is much better than that, because, it seems to me, there would always be danger of the reappointment being made through favoritism—that political feeling would come in—and that is what I think ought not to be allowed.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. But if it required another examination and a competitive one for reappointment——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. That would do away with that objection; but I do not see any advantage in the suggestion. I do not think the argument made by the gentleman from Ohio, for instance, that it is a good thing for a young man to come in and go into a Department for four or five or six years, is a good argument. I should think it was a bad thing for an ambitious young man to do that. It gets him in the habit of short hours, an indolent life, and as far as that goes it rather tends to kill his ambition and to unfit him for success in other branches of life, it seems to me.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. The gentleman certainly will admit that the present system has gotten us into a deplorable condition. Even if he believes, as I know he does, in the competitive examination system for appointment, the life tenure incident of the present civil service has got us into a deplorable state of affairs. What remedy do the particular proponents and friends of this system have to offer for this condition?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Why, does not the suggestion of the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. LITTAUER] offer a complete remedy? Of course the difficulty now is not with the law, but with the execution of the law.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I do not believe myself that a man is always incompetent at that age.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. No, he is not; but is there any unfairness in that proposition?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. And it may be suggested that there are a great many incompetents who are under that age under the present system.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes; and under any system there will be a great many incompetents, unquestionably. But the gentleman must remember that every one of these incompetents can be removed if the man over him wants to remove him, and that is what you can not have in every kind of service.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I will not interrupt the gentleman again, but that reply seems to me to indicate the almost fatal attitude of mind of those who are particularly friendly to this sort of law, that it could be ideally enforced, but as a matter of fact it does not work.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. No; it does not work, and therefore this proposition is brought in.

Mr. BRICK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. BRICK. I understand the gentleman has given a great deal of attention to this bill and to the difficulty that attaches to employees under the civil service, and of removing them for incompetency.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. We had hearings at the last Congress on that subject.

Mr. BRICK. And the gentleman has considered many plans for its remedy?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. BRICK. And there have been a great number of plans and remedies presented to cure that evil?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. BRICK. One of them, as I understood the gentleman in his speech a while ago, was that if we would drop from each Department 1 per cent, or a certain per cent, each year, that would in a way tend to remove the evil; but I would like to ask the gentleman if that would not be attended by hardships here and there?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. It would.

Mr. BRICK. Because a Department might have all good men, and some good men would have to be the lowest.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. That is true.

Mr. BRICK. Has the gentleman ever discovered a scheme that was not attended with some hardship to the individual?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. No; as I said a few minutes ago, it seems to me that individual hardships have got to give way for the public good.

Mr. BRICK. That is true everywhere, and true in the laws of nature.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. BRICK. I take it, then, that we will have to do the best we can to approximate a system of elimination?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. It seems to me that is certainly what we have got to do.

Mr. BRICK. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman if, under the circumstances and all of the investigations the gentleman has made, there is any more practical solution of the difficulty than the one now presented in this bill before the committee?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. It seems to me that this is a very practical remedy for it, and absolutely cures the evil.

Mr. BRICK. And every young man who goes into the service, when he is examined, knows that in twenty-five or thirty years he has got to go out, and that he must prepare himself to go out, and save money and get in a prepared condition to step out?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes; and we give them a much larger compensation than is paid outside, and he has an opportunity to prepare for that.

Mr. BRICK. It has been stated here that expenses in Washington are greater than they are outside. Is that necessarily true?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. It does not seem to me that it is, although I am not a very good judge of that, perhaps.

Mr. BRICK. The gentleman does not take it, then, that with all the notice of a lifetime to everybody entering the civil service that when he reaches the age of 70, or sooner if he becomes inefficient, he shall retire—that there is any qualification of unfairness about it?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. It does not seem to me so, except, perhaps, in some individual cases there might be an injustice.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have taken more time than I intended to from the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized in his own right.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I will.

Mr. PRINCE. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: Do the clerks who work outside of the Departments here in the District of Columbia receive for like services as much pay as the clerks in the Departments receive for like services?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not think they do.

Mr. PRINCE. Does it cost the clerks outside of the Departments any less to live in the District of Columbia than it does the clerks in the Departments?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I can not conceive how it should.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. We might as well be perfectly fair about this business.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I hope to be.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know the gentleman wants to be; it is a question of information on certain subjects and no one of us has it all. I am in favor of some remedy for this evil, as everybody knows, but as a matter of fact it does cost more to live in Washington than it does in other cities.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. The gentleman did not understand the question of the gentleman from Illinois. He asked if it cost any more for a clerk in the Department to live here than for a clerk outside the Department.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of course if two men live in the same style in Washington it makes no sort of difference whether one is in the Department and one out. But the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRICK] asked the gentleman from Massachusetts a question and the gentleman said he didn't know about it; that was whether it cost any more to live in Washington than it cost somewhere else.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. My experience is—and I take it mine is about the same as anybody else's—that it costs more to live in the city of Washington than any other place I was ever in in my life. [Laughter.] That is, to live in the same style of living. I have lived in Cincinnati, in Jefferson City, a little while in St. Louis, but generally in country places.

Taking into consideration the cost of living in the city of Washington and the cost of living in a country place, I think all will admit that the cost of living in Washington is at least double that which it will cost in a country place.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly it will be in any big city.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that it costs more in New York City to live than it does in the city of Washington.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is perhaps true. I would guess that it costs more to live in New York than it does to live here.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I suppose the size of the city always adds to the expense.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I suppose so. An unusually large number of people board here.

Mr. BRICK. Mr. Chairman, the idea I had in the question I asked had behind it this, that I suppose that a man can live in Washington if he desires to, who is a clerk of a Department, as cheaply as he can in Chicago or Pittsburg or New York or any other large city.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not suppose there can be any very material difference.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I doubt very much as to whether that is true. This town runs largely on the half-year plan, and every other capital runs on the same principle. You undertake to rent a house here and you have to do one of two things about it. You have to rent it by the year—and you do not need it by the year—and pay a fair rental for it, or if you simply rent it for the session you pay twice as much rent as you ought to pay. Now, I believe that rents are higher here in proportion to the size of the town than they are in any other place in the United States, unless it be at Harrisburg or some other place that is a State capital, and the whole thing is run on the same half-year plan as it is here. While I am at it I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question about the matter. I ask this strictly for information. What is the reason that these heads of Departments can not be induced or compelled by some kind of process to discharge their duties in this matter?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I think you must ask them for that information.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But the gentleman has been investigating this matter for a good long time in his committee.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. But that does not bring me into confidential relation with the heads of Departments.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They are simply trying to shift the doing of an unpleasant act—and that is exactly what it is—from their own shoulders to our shoulders. I am willing to assume my part of the white man's burden, but I am not willing to take up any other person's part of it.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I suppose the difference between our duty and theirs is that we have done the general duty, and we have placed upon their shoulders the work of performing the specific, personal duty. It is a good deal harder to do that latter; to go to a man and say individually, "You must get out," than it is for us to pass a general order and say, "You must put them all out."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, in further answer to the question of the gentleman from Missouri I would suggest that the reason why these people say they can not do their duty is because we in the Senate and in the House will not let them; that we pile down upon them, and I have always been of the opinion that was once expressed by the Senator from Texas, Mr. BAILEY, that it would be a good idea to punish any Representative who went to an executive officer except when he was there at request in writing and unless he also replied in writing.

Mr. BRICK. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I think I can answer as to what some of the chiefs have said whose earnest desire is for the efficiency of the service, and that something may be done. In the first place they made the statement that a man's efficiency in the Department is in the inverse ratio of his Congressional influence. In the second place, they say that while there is a general rule where they may discharge for incompetency and where they attempt to enforce it, yet the Congressmen come to them and earnestly request that these clerks be retained, and they say as a matter of fact and practically that there is only one way in the world to regulate this matter, and that is to put the chiefs of the Departments in the position that when a Congressman or Senator comes to them with pressure they will be able to say, "This is the law and we can not do anything else."

Mr. MAHON. It is the law now.

Mr. BRICK. Yes; it is the law with a loophole. The law now is that any person permanently disabled or incompetent, not temporarily sick, shall be discharged, and with the loophole "temporarily incompetent" we succumb to the pressure, and a person is reported temporarily incompetent or only partially incompetent. It comes under the word "temporarily," and, as a matter of human nature, of kindness, and weakness, they are allowed to stay, and there is no other way of remedying the evil than to make a hard and fast rule by some plan or scheme, something like the one under discussion in this appropriation bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman indulge me to read a most remarkable historical statement, and, because it is remarkable, I beg the indulgence of the committee and of the gentleman from Massachusetts to allow me to read it. On page 3813 the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] used this language yesterday:

Mr. TAWNEY. There are men in the service drawing $1,600 who are 85 years of age, who have been furloughed and have not done a stroke of work for several years.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. There are men, Mr. Chairman—and we might as well finish the sentence—who are lifted in their chair to their desk, when they go at all. Let me say to you——

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Lifted in their chairs?

Mr. TAWNEY. And hauled to the Department day after day in carriages.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, two years ago, I think it was, your subcommittee on this bill had the Commissioner of Pensions before us—not the present Commissioner, but the preceding one—

I believe the preceding Commissioner was Mr. Ware, of Kansas—and we began to catechise him. He said very candidly, "I have a hundred people I do not need." "Well," we said, "as Representatives of the Government we can not, my dear man, appropriate money for those people when you do not need them." He said, "Cut them out." We asked him in what class they were, and he went through and picked out the classes and cut out a hundred clerks. We came back the next winter and found we had to appropriate for every single one of them; that not one of them had been cut out. Now, can you think it strange that your Committee on Appropriations, after trying these different plans all these years, would come up here with an arbitrary rule? Why, we asked him the question, "Why did you not do it?" He said there were two causes—one was humanity and the other was pressure. You put this in here now, strike out that clause from the bill, adopting no substitute or amendment, and go away from here, and we will have to appropriate in a deficiency act next fall for a lot of clerks that we have not appropriated for—three or four or five hundred thousand dollars which we will have to come back here next winter and take care of.

Now, that is what the gentleman from Georgia said yesterday, that after they had picked out clerks and had cut them out of the law, the Commissioner did not discharge them for two reasons, "humanity and pressure," he says.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What point does the gentleman from Tennessee make in regard to that?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I am much obliged to the gentleman from Tennessee for giving way to me.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will tell the gentleman. I was simply reading it as a remarkable historical statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I just came in and I did not know what use the gentleman was making of that statement.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I read it because, as I said, it was a most remarkable statement of history—a fact that as strong a man as Mr. Ware, Pension Commissioner, could not obey the law because of humanity and because of outside pressure. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] had just alluded to the question of "pressure."

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to briefly call attention to a subject which is connected, though somewhat remotely perhaps, with the particular appropriation bill which is now under consideration. It is connected with it in that if the legislation involved in the bills to which attention will be called should be enacted, it would result in the curtailment of appropriations by future Congresses in the amounts which will otherwise be necessary for the judiciary branch of the Government, but this is not its most important phase.

On the 26th of last month I introduced two bills, being H. R. 15720 and H. R. 15721, respectively. These bills are as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15720) to limit the jurisdiction of district and circuit courts of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That the district and circuit courts of the United States shall not take original cognizance of any suit of a civil nature, either at common law or in equity, between a corporation created or organized by or under the laws of any State in which such corporations at the time the cause of action accrued may have been carrying on any business authorized by the law creating it, except the court having jurisdiction of the domicile of the corporation, except in cases arising under the patent or copyright laws, and in like cases in which said courts are authorized to take original cognizance of suits between citizens of the same State; nor shall any such suit between such a corporation and a citizen or citizens of a State in which it may be doing business be removed to any circuit court of the United States except in like cases in which such removal is authorized by the existing law in suits between citizens of the same State: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to affect suits pending in the courts of the United States at the time this act shall take effect.

A bill (H. R. 15721) to amend the jurisdiction act of 1887 so as to abrogate Federal jurisdiction over State corporations when the jurisdiction is founded only on the fact that the action or suit brought is between citizens of different States.

Be it enacted, etc., That the first section of an act entitled "An act to amend the act of Congress approved March 3, 1875, entitled 'An act to determine the jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States, and to regulate the removal of causes from the State courts, and for other purposes,' and to further regulate the jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1887, which act was corrected by an act approved August 13, 1888, entitled "An act to correct the enrollment of an act approved March 3, 1887," be, and the same hereby is, amended by striking out the words "if such instrument be payable to bearer and be not made by any corporation" in said section; and that said section be, and hereby is, further amended by adding at the end of said section the following words: "And when the jurisdiction is founded only on the fact that the action or suit is between citizens of different States, corporations shall not be deemed citizens of the State which creates them, nor be treated as such for the purposes of jurisdiction; but all corporations chartered under the laws of any State are, for the purposes of jurisdiction in the courts of the United States, declared to be citizens, residents, and inhabitants in each and every State where they have an office or an agent, or in which they carry on and conduct any part of their corporate business."

SEC. 2. That the second section of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the period at the end of the second paragraph of said section and inserting a semicolon in place thereof and adding then the following words: "but no corporation having an agent or an office or carrying on any part of its corporate business in any State wherein suits by or against it, in the corporate name, are now pending or may hereafter be brought, shall be deemed to be a nonresident of such State so as to permit a removal of such suit or action to the circuit court of the United States solely upon the ground of its nonresidence or noncitizenship, but such corporations, for the purpose of jurisdiction in the courts of the United States and in the courts of the States, are declared to be, and shall be deemed and construed by the the courts to be, citizens, inhabitants, and residents in each State wherein they have or may, at the time of the accrual of the cause of action, have an office or agent or be engaged in carrying on any part of their corporate business or exercising any of their corporate franchises: Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to prevent corporations from removing suits or actions against them in the corporate name to the proper courts of the United States for any reason or upon any ground now fixed by law for such removal save only when the sole ground is that such corporation is a nonresident of the State where sued, or is a citizen of some State other than where sued."

These bills were, of course, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and are now pending before that committee. The object of both bills is precisely the same, which is to abrogate the jurisdiction of United States district and circuit courts over State corporations where the sole ground of such jurisdiction is the diversity of citizenship of the parties to the litigation. There are, it is believed, two distinct lines of legislaton by which Congress can bring about this abrogation, and both of these lines are presented in these bills, the first bill being a direct and original enactment and the second bill being an amendment to an existing statute in which the jurisdictional status of corporations relative to the courts of the United States, or, to be exact, circuit and district United States courts, is declared.

I trust it may be clearly understood in the very beginning just what is the scope of the proposed legislation. It affects existing law only in so far as the question of jurisdiction depends upon the character or citizenship of the parties litigating, and affects only corporations in this regard. All other grounds of jurisdiction are left untouched.

HISTORY OF LEGISLATIVE AND JUDICIAL ACTION.

The third article of the Constitution of the United States is devoted to the judiciary. The second section of that article provides that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to nine classes of cases which are there specifically enumerated. The sixth class, that of cases between a State and citizens of another State, was eliminated or abrogated by the eleventh amendment to the Constitution, so that now there are eight classes of actions, together with such others as may arise under the fifth and fourteenth amendments, to which the judicial power of the United States extends. Omitting all except that class directly involved in the proposed bills I am discussing, and for clearness quoting the exact language of the organic law, we have this:

The judicial power shall extend to all cases between citizens of different States.

The first serious business which engaged the attention of the first Senate of the United States was the judiciary act, establishing the various courts and making provision for their jurisdiction. This act, after extensive and learned debate in the Senate and the House, was passed by both bodies, signed by the President, and became the law on September 24, 1789. It is usually referred to as the judiciary act of 1789. The eleventh section of that act provided as follows:

The circuit courts shall have original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several States, of all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity, where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of five hundred dollars, when the suit is between a citizen of the State where the suit is brought and a citizen of another State.

Section 12 of that act provided that the defendant in any case concerning which jurisdiction was given by section 11 to the circuit courts of the United States might remove the cause from any State court in which he was sued to the Federal circuit court by the filing of petition alleging or setting forth the diversity of citizenship, etc.

The provisions of sections 11 and 12 of the original judiciary act, in so far as they related to jurisdiction based on diversity in citizenship, remained unchanged until the act of July 27, 1866. (Chap. 288, vol. 14, p. 306. U. S. Statutes at Large.) By this act the removal phase of the law was amended so as to provide in substance that suits, where the matter in dispute exceeds $500, brought in State courts against aliens, or by citizens of the State where brought against any citizen of said State and a citizen of another State, if the suit, in so far as it relates to the alien or nonresident defendant, is or has been instituted for the purpose of restraining or enjoining him, or if the suit is one in which there can be a final determination of the controversy, so far as it concerns him, without the presence of the other defendants as parties in the cause, then such alien defendant may remove the cause to the circuit court of the district where the suit is pending.

In 1867 the act of March 2 amended the removal law so as to provide that either defendant or plaintiff in a cause might, when the amount involved was more than $500, remove the same to the Federal court by making affidavit that on account of prejudice or local influence he had reason to believe and did believe he could not obtain justice in the State court. This act, which was thought to be made necessary by conditions growing out of the war of secession, did not, however, affect the removal where the sole ground was that of diverse citizenship; but in 1875 the act of March 3 (chap. 137, vol. 14, p. 470) further amended the removal act so that either party to the suit, where the controversy was between citizens of different States, as well as in other causes, might remove the action to the Federal court, thus putting the plaintiff on the same ground precisely as the defendant had been all along. The effect of this act was, of course, to give the plaintiff two elections. He could first sue in the State court, and if he saw that he was likely to lose there could at any time remove the action to the Federal court.

This act made some changes in the language of the statutes, but none in the meaning of the law.

The act of March 3, 1887, was amendatory of the act of 1875. This act of March 3, 1887, however, contained about twenty errors in spelling and punctuation in its enrollment, and accordingly this enrollment was corrected by the act of August 13, 1888 (being chap. 866, p. 433 of vol. 25). By the amendment contained in this act as so corrected the amount required to be involved in order for the Federal courts to have jurisdiction on grounds of diverse citizenship, as well as certain other cases, was changed from $500 to $2,000.

There was also the following change in the law: The act of 1875 provided that no circuit or district court should have cognizance of any suit founded on contract in favor of an assignee, if no assignment had been made, except in cases of promissory notes negotiable by the law merchant and bills of exchange.

The act of 1887, as corrected by the act of 1888, provides on this point as follows:

> Nor shall any circuit or district court have cognizance of any suit, except upon foreign bills of exchange, to recover the contents of any promissory note or other chose in action in favor of any assignee or of any subsequent holder if such instrument be payable to bearer and be not made by any corporation, unless such suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover the contents if no assignment or transfer had been made.

This act of 1887 also repealed the provision of the act of March 3, 1875, which permitted the plaintiff to remove a suit on the grounds of diverse citizenship, the reason for the repeal being that having once elected his tribunal he should be bound by his election.

The act of 1887 also made a change in the language which was by many considered as quite significant at the time. The second section of the act of 1875 had provided as follows:

> That any suit of a civil nature at law or in equity, now pending or hereafter brought in any State court where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of $500, and arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made or which shall be made under their authority, or in which the United States shall be plaintiff or petitioner, or in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different States, or a controversy between citizens of the same State claiming land under grants of different States, or controversies between citizens of a State and foreign States, citizens, or subjects, either party may remove said suit into the circuit court of the United States.

The act of 1887, as corrected by the act of 1888, provides that the second section of the act of 1875, which has just been quoted, be amended so as to read as follows:

> That any suit of a civil nature at law or in equity arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made or which shall be made under their general authority, of which the circuit courts are given original jurisdiction by the preceding section, which may now be pending, or which may be hereafter brought, in any State court may be removed by the defendant or defendants therein to the circuit court of the United States for the proper district.
> Any other suit of a civil nature at law or in equity of which the circuit courts are given jurisdiction by the preceding section—

And this phrase "any other suit" includes those where the ground of jurisdiction is solely diversity of citizenship, since that class is not included in the first paragraph where the classes are expressly set forth—> and which are now pending or which may hereafter be brought in any State court may be removed into the circuit court of the United States for the proper district by the defendant or defendants therein being nonresidents of that State.

There being a well-understood distinction in law as well as in fact between residence and citizenship, it was believed by many of the legal profession at the time, as will appear from reading articles in the law magazines contemporary with that act, that the intention of Congress was to restrict the right of removal to nonresidents of a State wherein they were sued, and, arguing that a corporation having an office, an agent, and carrying on all or a portion of its corporate business in a State was, in the commonly accepted meaning of the term, a resident of such State, it was insisted that the act of 1887 would abrogate Federal jurisdiction over State corporations where the sole ground of such jurisdiction was technical diversity of citizenship. This view was not, however, taken by the Federal courts. Residence was construed to be the same thing, in the sense of that jurisdiction act, as citizenship.

This is all the legislation respecting the matter sought to be affected by the proposed bills.

Turning now to the judicial branch of the Government and looking to the action of the courts upon the subject, we find that in 1809, while Marshall was Chief Justice, the three cases of Hope Insurance Company, of Providence, v. Boardman et al.; Bank of the United States v. Deveaux et al., and the Maryland Insurance Company v. Wood, came before the court, all at the same term, and were all heard together. The controlling issue or leading question in each case was whether a corporation aggregate was a citizen in the sense of the legislation as based upon or carrying out the constitutional provisions as to jurisdiction where the controversy or suit "is between a citizen of the State where the suit is brought and a citizen of another State."

It was held by the Chief Justice and the court, in an unanimous opinion delivered by Marshall himself, that such was not the status of a corporation. The main opinion was delivered in the Deveaux case, and it was in that opinion that Marshall used the oft-quoted language:

> That invisible, intangible, and artificial being, that mere legal entity, a corporation aggregate, is certainly not a citizen, and consequently can not sue or be sued in the courts of the United States unless the rights of the members in this respect can be exercised in their corporate name. If the corporation be considered as a mere faculty, and not as a company of individuals, who, in transacting their joint concerns, may use a legal name, they must be excluded from the courts of the Union.

Following this general statement there is a minute examination into the nature and character of a corporation, and the conclusion is reached that a corporation, as such, chartered by a State, is not, for jurisdictional purposes, a citizen of that State or a noncitizen of another State, and may not in the corporate name sue a citizen of another State in the courts of the United States; but if it was made to appear as a fact that the citizens owning the stock of or composing the corporation aggregate were citizens of another State from that of the party sued, then the United States courts would have jurisdiction. In other words, the doctrine as there laid down is that where the members of a corporation are aliens or citizens of a different State from the opposite party and this fact was made to appear (presumably in the pleadings) the judiciary act of 1789 confers jurisdiction of suits to which they are parties, acting for their corporation, upon the circuit courts of the United States; but so long as the suit is in the corporate name, treating the corporation as an entity, under the opinion of Marshall, adhered to so long as he was on the bench and repeated in frequent decisions, a corporation aggregate was not a citizen in the jurisdictional sense.

This remained the law until 1844. In that year the celebrated case of the Louisville, Cincinnati and Charleston Railroad Company v. Letson came before the court, of which Taney was then Chief Justice. In that case the doctrine as laid down by Marshall was, to use the language of the reporter, "reviewed and controlled." Those words mean there, as of course, that the doctrine was squarely overruled and a directly opposite construction given of the statute, which had not been changed in any respect bearing upon this question, and the doctrine since adhered to was laid down that—

A corporation created by and transacting business in a State is to be deemed an inhabitant of that State, capable of being treated as a citizen for all purposes of suing and being sued, and an averment of the fact of its creation and the place of transacting business is sufficient to give the circuit courts jurisdiction.

This doctrine was rapidly carried to its logical end wherein it was held that a corporation was conclusively presumed for jurisdictional purposes to be a citizen of the State in which it was incorporated, and the declaration was made (Kans. Pac. R. R. Co. v. Atchison, etc., R. R. Co., 112 U. S.), that in all cases where a Federal court can take jurisdiction of controversies between citizens, it will take jurisdiction of like controversies between corporations, or between a corporation and a citizen, and treat the corporations as citizens of the States under whose laws they were created and continue to exist.

The doctrine has been pressed still further, and the rule has been established by the Supreme Court (Nashua, etc., R. R. Co. v. Boston, etc., R. R. Co., 136 U. S.), though by a bare majority of that body, that where a corporation is created by the concurrent acts of two States it is foreign to both in a jurisdictional sense. This was a case where a corporation was created by concurrent acts of Massachusetts and New Hampshire. Under that decision, if that corporation be sued in a State court of New Hampshire it can remove the case to the Federal court—the amount involved being sufficient—on the ground that it is a citizen of the State of Massachusetts. If sued in Massachusetts it straightway moves the case to the Federal court, because, forsooth, it is a citizen of New Hampshire.

For something like fifty years, then, it was the uniform holding of the Supreme Court that a corporation was not a citizen in the jurisdictional sense, and for something like sixty-five years it has been held that it was such a citizen.

In endeavoring to present argument in behalf of the enactment of the legislation proposed in the bills I am discussing, it is not deemed necessary to go into the legal rightfulness or wrongfulness of the opinions of the courts. That is a mere academic question. The later opinion has been greatly criticised by the profession and was not unanimously acquiesced in by the judges in the earlier years of its promulgation, but it is not at all probable that it will ever be overturned by the court itself. The doctrine of stare decisis will be applied. It is a great pity that Justice Taney did not apply that in the Letson case in 1844.

CONGRESS ALONE CAN ACCOMPLISH THE RESULT.

It is only through Congressional action that this abrogation may be brought about. Under the now well-settled decisions of the Supreme Court the respective States can not accomplish the result.

Some years ago the State of Iowa, through its legislature, enacted that corporations desiring to do business in that State should file copies of their charters and secure a license from the State authority. I can not remember the precise details of the statute, but in a general way can state that under that Iowa statute it was made a condition precedent to the issuance of such license that the corporation should file an agreement that when sued in the courts of that State it would not remove such suit to the Federal courts.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And Kentucky also passed such a law.

Mr. GARRETT. And Kentucky also passed such a law, the gentleman from Mississippi suggests. I do not remember the Kentucky statute, though I am sure the gentleman from Mississippi is correct. If I mistake not, a very large number of States have passed such acts. I remember the Iowa case distinctly, however, because I saw it just a few days ago in my investigation of this question. I am sure I am not mistaken as to the State. A railroad company, I think it was, complied with the Iowa requirements and operated in that State. It was sued in the State court and immediately filed a petition for the removal of the controversy to the Federal court. The cause came before the Supreme court of the United States, and it was held that the State could not impose such a conditions under the facts of that case. I do not think this decision goes further than to hold that a State may not prevent the removal of a cause to the Federal court. The question of whether the State could enforce a forfeiture of the right to do business in its limits under such conditions has probably not been decided squarely as yet.

It being beyond the reach of State legislation, and there being no probability of the courts reversing the decisions so long acquiesced in, I repeat, Congressional action alone can give the relief.

CONGRESS HAS THE POWER.

Now, it is not supposed that there can be any serious question that Congress has the power to define the jurisdictional status of State corporations relative to the district and circuit courts. The courts have certainly never held as a constitutional proposition that corporations were, for jurisdictional purposes, the same as natural persons. Their holdings have always been in construing the statutes.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will it interrupt the gentleman if I make a suggestion?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly not; I shall appreciate any suggestion the gentleman will be kind enough to offer.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it not true that all Federal courts, except the Supreme Court of the United States, have only such powers as Congress sees fit to delegate to them?

Mr. GARRETT. That is correct. I thank the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] for calling my attention to that at this point.

The question, if there can be a question, is simply this: Is a corporation a citizen in the constitutional sense so as to place its status as regards court jurisdiction beyond the reach of legislative definition or declaration? The legislation proposed in my bills does not, of course, affect jurisdiction where it is a controversy between natural persons. The provision of the Constitution is that the judicial power shall extend, etc. It does not provide that such jurisdiction shall be exclusive, but leaves to the Congress the regulation of jurisdiction in all cases whatsoever except those affecting ambassadors and other public ministers and consuls and cases to which a State is a party. The exercise of the power is wholly dependent upon legislative action. The doctrine laid down in Gaines v. Fuentes (92 U. S., p. 10) is conclusive of that proposition.

As an instance of this, Congress made a limitation of amount involved, requiring in the first judiciary act that before there should be an application of the Federal judicial power the amount involved must be more than $500, and later provided that it must be more than $2,000. No question has ever been made, so far as I can ascertain, of the constitutional power to make this limitation. Again, in the matter of removal the Congress has limited the right of removal to one party to the suit—the defendant. It has been conclusively settled that this might be constitutionally done. By a parity of reasoning it would seem to be unquestionable that the Congress can declare the status of a corporation—an artificial entity, itself the offspring of law—relative to the courts. In construing the Constitution we must in all instances view its provisions and terms according as they were understood at the time of its adoption. Certainly corporations aggregate were not included in the term "he" when the Constitution was adopted.

REASONS FOR THE LEGISLATION.

If the power exists, then it becomes wholly a matter of social and civic expediency. At present the situation is most anomalous. The effect of the present law is to encourage incorporation of institutions in States other than that in which it is intended to carry on the corporate business. There are thousands and thousands of corporations that never perform a single corporate act in the State by which they are chartered, except, perhaps, to pay the secretary of state the fees for a certified copy of the charter.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit the interruption——

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to suggest—and I don't know whether it is a fact or not—that it has been popularly reported that the State of New Jersey has several times granted powers to a corporation with the provision that that corporation should not exercise those powers in the State of New Jersey.

Mr. GARRETT. I have understood that to be a fact, but am not able to assert it positively. It is certain that the law now existing—for court construction, judicial legislation, is as effective as legislation by Congress—encourages a State to recklessness in granting charters where it is known by the State agents that the incorporation is not to operate in that State.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. GARRETT. I shall be glad to have it.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I think it is a fact that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company is chartered under the laws of the State of Kentucky——

Mr. GARRETT. That is a fact, as I understand it.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. And that under its charter it would not be permitted to build a single mile of road in Kentucky.

Mr. GARRETT. I do not know, I will say to my friend from Texas [Mr. BEALL], about the specific provision that that company should not do business in Kentucky, but I do know that it was incorporated there and that it never had an inch of line in the State and never intended to have any there, but was chartered after the doctrine in the case of Railroad Company v. Letson was promulgated for the sole purpose of taking advantage of its technical citizenship under that doctrine in order to avoid jurisdiction in the courts of any State where it did intend to do business. That is a historic fact .

This law is directly responsible for the so-called "tramp corporations" that obtain charters from some State with no intention of doing business there, with not a single person in that State owning a share in the corporation. There is an intimation in the earlier cases that the fact that generally citizens of the State were the incorporators of institutions chartered by that State had some influence in fixing the doctrine of the citizenship of the corporation itself in that State. This view was certainly not very farsighted or accurate in fact.

First, then, we may say that protection from the reckless granting of corporate charters demands this legislation.

Again, Mr. Chairman, this legislation is demanded because under the existing laws foreign corporations enjoy privileges not enjoyed by domestic institutions. I happen to hold life insurance policies in two New York companies. Those policies were written at my home by a neighbor who was an agent—and corporations, it must never be forgotten, can act only through agents—and the first premiums were paid to him. All subsequent premiums have been remitted not to New York, but to Memphis, Tenn., to a branch office of these companies. The whole original transaction, except perhaps the examination of the physician's notes respecting my physical condition—and he, by the way, is a home physician—and the possible signing of some officer's name to the policy, and all subsequent acts in regard to the transaction have been wholly carried out in Tennessee. Those companies enjoy the same rights of activity there that Tennessee companies have. Yet if the amount of my policies was a little larger, and at my death a lawsuit should become necessary to collect them, my widow or representatives would have to go 100 or more miles, if the company should so choose, to find a tribunal in which to enforce the contract. A Tennessee company, no matter what the amount, would have to answer within a few hundred yards, or, at most, within a few miles of my home.

One other illustration: Through my home town there runs a line of railway which belongs to a corporation chartered by the State of Tennessee, and which is therefore a citizen of that State. Just a few miles away another line, which belongs to a Kentucky corporation, crosses this Tennessee citizen's property. The Kentucky corporation probably has twice as many miles of road in Tennessee as has the Tennessee company. It has condemned, under the right of eminent domain granted by our State, twice as much land as has the Tennessee citizen. It employs two or three times as many persons of Tennessee to carry on its corporate business. It has the same protection from our peace officers, the same rights, immunities, and privileges under our laws. Yet if a cause of action growing out of contract or tort arise against the larger Kentucky company, the individual having such right must, if the amount be more than $2,000, pursue his remedy in an entirely different tribunal from that in which he would pursue a remedy for a like condition against the domestic company.

While studying this matter I have endeavored to secure a statement of the number of corporations that carried on their corporate business wholly or partly beyond the limits of the State which chartered them, but have been unable to get it. I venture the assertion, however, from such information as I have been able to obtain, that of all the business carried on by private corporations in the several States one-half of it is done by nonresident corporations. Half the mining business in the various States is done by corporations chartered in States other than those in which they operate, and so of electric-lighting plants and railways, gas companies, waterworks establishments, and various semipublic works.

Again, sir, the convenience of the citizenry demands this legislation. Corporations are increasing with astonishing rapidity. Every business known to men is being carried on by corporations—corporations that reach out beyond the States that charter them into other States. Our whole business, social, and educational life is being honeycombed with them. I am not complaining about that. There is no sense in fighting corporations just because they are corporations. They play an important part in the development of the country. They are necessary. But at the same time the matter of enforcing rights against them in the courts with speed and convenience must be preserved to the citizens. I was much struck with a remark of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] the other day, when, in discussing another bill before the House, he said:

I would have the courts go to the people, not force the people to go far to the courts.

It is the boast of our race that courts of justice are always open to the citizen. It will become an idle boast—a foolish, deceiving boast—if those courts are so far removed from him, or are so congested with business as that he may not have a convenient and speedy determination of his complaints. At present, sir, it is a matter of most frequent occurrence that a part of a citizen's rights are surrendered, he prefering to give up a part rather than go from 50 to 200 and 300 miles to obtain a tribunal to try them. Then, too, litigation is very much more costly in the Federal than in the State courts. I do not know how it is in all the States, but I am sure that in my own Commonwealth the fees in her courts are from one-third to one-half less than are the fees charged—court fees, I mean—in Federal courts. Lawyers' fees, too, are higher, as a rule, in the Federal tribunals.

But the advocates of the policy proposed in these bills are sometimes met with the suggestion that if this be adopted, nonresident corporations will suffer in the State courts from prejudice and local influence. The best answer to this is that it is not true. That a certain prejudice exists against corporations, varying in intensity in different sections of the country, is not to be denied, but it as strong against domestic as against foreign institutions. The average juror never thinks whether the corporation whose rights he is trying is a domestic or a foreign establishment. If you leave the jury box and go to the courts, I protest that there is nothing in the history of the courts of the several States which justifies any suggestion that they are inferior to the Federal tribunals, either in intelligence, integrity, or impartiality.

It is true, of course, that they are elected by the people for a stated term and must be reelected to continue long in power. But when have the interests of citizens been hurt by this necessity for State judges to return at stated periods to the people for a new lease of power? For every case which can be pointed out where harm has come I believe I could point to an equally large number where harm has come because of the life tenure of Federal judges. But comparisons of wrongdoings are needless.

I am not criticizing the Federal judiciary. I am resting this case upon plain business principles—convenience to the citizens, fairness to all corporations, protection from reckless granting of charters, economy to the individual. It might also be added that it will be economy to the Government. I dare say a third, certainly a fourth, of the business now in Federal courts would not be there if this legislation should be enacted. If it be not enacted, the number of Federal judges and districts must continue to increase. The Judiciary Committee at every session is called upon to establish new districts and judgeships. Then come the calls upon the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Had this law been passed shortly after the decision of the Letson case, in 1844, it is not probable that we should have needed the United States circuit court of appeals.

There is one other reason, Mr. Chairman, and it really comprehends all those I have endeavored to give. That is, the passage of this legislation would be a restoration to the several States of governmental functions which really ought to be exercised by those States. I do not think we have to get on "strict-construction" ground to favor it. Marshall certainly was not a strict constructionist. If I remember correctly, he denied being either a strict constructionist or a liberal constructionist, but desired to be known as a natural constructionist.

To one who studies the matter in the light of the political history of the country it may seem somewhat strange that Marshall, who had broadest ideas of the nationality of the United States, gave the decision which denied to corporations the quality of jurisdictional citizenship, while Taney, who was supposed to hold more sacred the rights of the States, rendered the decision which has served to deprive one department of the State government of large quantities of business which, in strict right, it does seem ought to belong to it.

It would seem, Mr. Chairman, that there is one fundamental principle of government—fundamental in such a government as ours, composed of at least three and sometimes five systems—upon which we might all, ought all, agree. Certainly it would be a safe and sound policy if we would so administer and exercise our several governmental forces as that the power of United States Government should begin only where the power of the State government must end, letting every governmental function which can be better or as well exercised by the States remain with the States and devoting the powers and forces of the General Government to only those questions and issues which lie beyond the scope or reach of State authority. I would go a step further. I would say that wherever the line of demarcation between State and Federal authority is shadowy and indistinct the genius of our Constitution requires that the doubt should be resolved in favor of the State and against the Union. There, I know, is the parting of the ways with many, for the man who believes in the strongly centralized Federal Government would resolve the doubt in favor of it and against the State. But without stopping to quarrel over that matter now, these bills propose legislation that, tested by the general rule concerning which there can be no reasonable dispute, ought to pass.

Certainly the courts of the States can administer justice as well where foreign corporations are involved as they can where domestic institutions are concerned. Certainly they can determine rights with as much justice as can the Federal courts and can determine them more cheaply, more conveniently, and more quickly.

Sir, are there any of us so dull as not to realize the presence among the masses of a subtle spirit of unrest and dissatisfaction? It may be vague; we may not be able to define it or to trace it to its causes, but we must know that it exists; and it is leading us—whither? We do not know. We can not tell. As we can not always trace it to its causes, so, sir, we can not trace it to its results. We ought to know, however, that it is not to be idly passed by and scoffed at. Is it not the sound, sensible, governmental thing to do to return speedily with all the functions of government—legislative, executive, judicial—as close to the people to whom they belong as we may?

There is not, sir, a single argument to be advanced which can be fortified by sound reasoning, based either on theories of government or facts of American experience, why corporations permitted by the courtesy and comity of a State to enter its limits from another State in which they were chartered and have all the immunities and the privileges allowed domestic institutions, have, in proper cases, the sovereign right of condemning private property for their use, have the protection of the laws and the peace officers for their properties, and their agents in all respects the same as a local establishment—not one reason, Mr. Chairman, why such corporations should not, without reference to the amount involved, answer in the courts of that State on their contracts and for their torts. [Loud applause.]

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, yesterday I called the attention of the chairman of the subcommittee who has this bill in charge to the fact that at the proper time I would offer an amendment to the bill on page 163, in line 18. The amendment that I shall offer will be as follows:

Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall apply to a person who served in the Army or Navy in the civil war and was honorably discharged, or his widow.

I want this provision to apply only to those who served in the Army or the Navy during the time of the civil war who have in their possession an honorable discharge for that very meritorious service.

I give notice that at the proper time I shall offer this amendment as read, and shall ask for its adoption.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I want to continue the discussion of immigration which I began in this House three of four days ago, with the understanding that any amount of interruption of a fair kind is welcome.

The other day I pointed out certain things which, for the sake of lucidity, I am going to recapitulate for a few minutes. I pointed out to this House the necessity for keeping fairly in our minds the difference between the selection of immigration and the restriction of immigration. There are two schools of thought; one school believes in selective measures and the other believes in restrictive measures. The ideas of the selective school, for instance, are expressed by the bill of Senator DILLINGHAM, which provides for the exclusion of aliens of poor physique or weak-minded, and of minors whose parents remain in their country of origin.

The bill for a head tax is a restrictive bill, introduced for the purpose of cutting immigration down in numbers, absolutely irrespective of the quality of the immigrant himself.

Now, I also want to recapitulate what I said about the importation of contract labor. I made the statement that, in my opinion, not much less than two-thirds of our adult male immigration comes here under a contract expressed or implied. In support of my contention I published in the RECORD a statement made by Commissioner-General Sargent; by Mr. Campbell, of the Immigration Bureau; by Commissioner Williams, of New York, and by Inspector Marcus Braun.

I want to explain more fully to this House why it is impossible to enforce our law against the admission of contract labor: Every vessel when it comes over here has on its manifest the name of each passenger. Against the name appears the answer to a series of questions as to his destination, as to the amount of money he has in his possession, as to his occupation, and as to whether or not he has paid his own expenses in coming here.

I have often examined these manifests, and I assure you, Mr. Chairman, that in the majority of cases the answers might as well be printed on the manifest as written. After an immigrant arriving in this country has passed the medical examiners he goes before an immigration inspector. The immigration inspector stands at a table with a long line of immigrants coming up to him. Next the inspector stands a clerk with the ship's manifest, and near by an interpreter. The alien is asked the various prescribed question, his answers being compared with the manifest. Almost invariably the answers correspond precisely with that document, because at the port of embarkation or elsewhere these immigrants are schooled to give such answers as will insure their admission into the United States. I have been told by a gentleman residing in Italy, who professes, at all events, to know about the immigration question, that in the city of Genoa alone three schools exist for the instruction of immigrants whose destination is the United States. The interpreter asks the immigrant such questions as appear to him appropriate. The inspector suggests more questions. They cross-examine him in every possible way, but, if he is properly schooled, the fact that he is coming in under a contract, expressed or implied, can not be proved. As a matter of fact, last year in only about 1,000 cases was the probability of the existence of a contract fairly proved.

Mr. McNARY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to his colleague?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. With pleasure.

Mr. McNARY. I should like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts how the imposition of a head tax will remedy that evil?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I am not committed to a head tax as the only remedy. Let me answer this question by first explaining how these contracts are made, after expressing an opinion that the imposition of a head tax would take the profit out of the importation of contract labor.

For example, suppose I am a Syrian conducting a Syrian boarding house in the city of Lowell. Perhaps some mill sends down to me for hands. I furnish them at a somewhat lower rate of wages than is expected by ordinary citizen help. I find recurrent opportunities to supply the cotton mills with Syrians.

Soon I hear that another mill is about to make an extension, so I say to myself "Back there in Syria is quite a profitable mine for me." Perhaps I go to the mill treasurer and get an advance of money. Perhaps I have the money myself. I return to Syria or I send some trusted agent, very likely a Syrian resident in the United States. One or the other of us goes back to Syria and there gathers together a number of emigrants, who come out here and, either by direct route or indirect route, finally arrive at my boarding house in the city of Lowell. Now, I can hold those people in my grip for a certain time, but only for a certain time. I tell them that if they do not pay me back the money advanced I will have them arrested, that they must hand over the full wages that they get in the mill on penalty of imprisonment. In fact, I avail myself of all means that are at my command to impose on them. Everyone knows how easy it is for a stranger to break the laws or the ordinances in a land where he does not understand the language, and they are held in mortal terror of the police. So by hook or by crook I manage to keep hold of those immigrants for some little time, at all events until they join a church or are informed as to their rights, or until some rival boarding-house keeper gets them away from me.

Meanwhile I take all their wages, while I feed them and keep them alive just as I would feed and keep a horse alive that I had imported for use in a livery stable. At the end of a certain time I lose control of them, but meanwhile I have worked out all the money that I gave them for passage, all they have cost me and some more, too. Now, in answer to the question of my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. McNARY] I contend that if I, the boarding-house keeper, am compelled to pay the United States Government $40 or some other large amount per head on each one of these laborers that I bring in, I shall have to keep them six weeks longer to work out the extra money. This, however, can not be done, as the boarding-house business is too strongly competitive. The immigrants learn their rights altogether too quickly, and the boarding-house keeper will not take the risk of the attempt to keep them for a long time. In fact, I have heard it said that there is not as much profit nowadays in importing foreigners as there used to be some years ago.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman mean to say that there are boarding houses anywhere in the United States that carry on that kind of business?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I do, indeed, say so.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Unfortunately, in the district I represent, as well as elsewhere.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I very much regret to hear that that occurs anywhere. But now another question: Are not the steamship companies to blame for bringing over these people, very largely? Do they not disobey the law and haul those people over just like a lot of cattle? I have heard that substantially stated, and I should like to have my friend, who is so well informed on the shipping business, and almost everything else, I may say, tell me whether that is or is not true. In other words, I am informed that this is the fact: Ship companies have agents in foreign countries that go through there with a fine-tooth comb, and out of the mud and filth and every place catch these people up like a lot of hungry animals and drive them on shipboard, and having entered into some sort of a contract with them by which they pay them a little something to bring them over here like so much freight or ballast, and then turn them loose, and we make citizens of them in a few weeks.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. It is unquestionably true, Mr. Chairman, that steamship companies have a good deal to do with the difficulty. The statement of the gentleman from Tennessee is accurate except in so much as he says that they use a fine-tooth comb. The comb need not be too fine toothed. There is such a tremendous field for emigration that a fairly broad-tooth comb will fill the vessels. As to conditions on board immigrant ships, I do not know that they are so bad as the gentleman thinks. Our navigation laws require 120 cubic feet for each passenger on such vessels, not taking into account the space taken by cargo, machinery, etc.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do not the companies practically recklessly disregard the idea of bringing good citizens here, and will they not take anybody, even if he is only an animal in human shape?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I think the only thing which induces a steamship company to select a desirable immigrant in place of an undesirable one is the danger that the steamship company will have to take the undesirable one back at its own expense if he is rejected by our inspectors.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is that law rigidly enforced?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I think it is enforced as well as it can be, but I think its wording could be improved.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. MCNARY. If I understood the answer of my colleague aright to my question as to how a head tax would prevent importation of contract laborers, he practically admitted that it was not under contract labor at all; that it was not the manufacturer or employer of labor, but that it was the boarding-house keeper who brought him here in order to make a few dollars out of him. I can not see, Mr. Chairman, that there is any contract labor in that at all. If I understood him aright, it is not the employer, not the manufacturer, not the man who is in business, but a speculating boarding-house keeper. Does the gentleman regard that as being contract labor?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. A contract expressed or implied is the reading of the law.

Mr. MCNARY. Does the gentleman say that he regards the speculation of a boarding-house keeper, if such exists, as contract employment of labor, bringing him from a foreign country and making a contract or agreement to put him to work in this country from the manufacturer and employer?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Now, the gentleman and I are both Yankees, so I am going to answer his question by asking him another. [Laughter.] Suppose the gentleman kept a livery stable and I was a contractor. I might go to him and say, "Mr. MCNARY, here is an advance of so much money. I shall require during the next summer at least sixty horses per diem for my contract business." Suppose that with the advance I directly or indirectly made, or even if I made no advance, he should import the sixty horses from Canada. Suppose, moreover, that on their arrival he should hire them out to me, would he consider that those horses were imported under a contract expressed or implied?

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. Chairman, I will answer that by saying to my colleague that his very question destroys the assumption that he previously made. He stated, if I understood him correctly, that the boarding-house keeper had to keep the men in order to get his money back. His question implies that the boarding-house keeper has previously got the money from the manufacturer or employer. Which way does the gentleman want to put it?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Either way. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCNARY. Then I may say that evidently the gentleman will adopt any argument to suit his purpose. I do not know that either is correct. I would like to have him produce some evidence that the boarding-house keepers import the men or that the manufacturer pays the boarding-house keeper.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. If I could present the evidence, I could put them into court. But to go on, Mr. Chairman, I think the discussion has elicited the fact that we all believe that these assisted immigrants come in and that it is very hard to tell just how the trick is done. I think it is unquestionable—if the gentleman doubts it I will give him the evidence—that the best opinion of those who know about such matters is that not much less than two-thirds of the adult males that come in here are contract laborers.

Mr. MCNARY. I would like to have that evidence.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. You will find it in Monday's RECORD, included in my address on this subject delivered last Wednesday.

Mr. MCNARY. I shall do myself the honor to read the address a little later.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just a moment, Mr. Chairman. I desire to make this observation with all kindness, that we observe for the first time that when Yankee meets Yankee there is no Waterloo for either. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCNARY] and myself make our acknowledgments.

We have heard a great deal of criticism as to the medical examination of immigrants coming into this country. We have heard it said that in better medical examination lies the true remedy, but that the present system is too hasty. Now, I desire to explain to this House just how this examination is made. I confess that I, too, thought it too hasty until I had carefully gone into the question. Each immigrant passes by two doctors. The first one merely lifts the hat, rubs his hand over the head of the immigrant, looks him over, and passes him by. The second doctor only examines the eyes for trachoma.

Most people think that is a hasty examination. Let us see what else happens. Every man who goes by either of those surgeons who appears too stout, or too old, or has a little eruption of some kind, or has anything else not quite normal, is chalked on his coat. When he passes the second doctor that man does not go to the inspector of immigration, but he goes around into the waiting room and there is subjected to a thorough physical examination. So far as my observation is concerned, about 30 per cent of the immigrants who go through the lines are chalked for a more complete examination. When the time comes for their second physical examination all the immigrants of whom there is the slightest suspicion are then undressed to such an extent as may be necessary, doctors are called in consultation, and a thorough diagnosis is made.

Ex-Commissioner Williams two or three years ago was informed that men afflicted with certain diseases readily concealed by clothing were passing unnoticed through Ellis Island. Accordingly he gave instructions that unmarried adult males to a large number—I have heard it stated as high as 10,000—should be examined entirely nude. This was done and the results tabulated. I am informed that the complaints and disabilities so detected in the 10,000 examined nude, on being compared with the average results obtained in each 10,000 examined with their clothes on, were found practically to correspond. This, to my mind, proves that our medical examination is sufficient for all practical purposes.

Where we fall down is on our inability to detect whether a man is coming in under contract or whether a man is likely to become a public charge. We all know that aliens likely to become paupers are admitted every day; but how is an inspector to determine with any degree of certainty whether a well-schooled immigrant with $50 in his pocket is likely to become a public charge or not? Like as not he is a rascal in the old country to whom $50 riddance money and a ticket has been given.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman how he would propose to remedy that?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, there is no remedy except by the imposition of a head tax sufficiently large. I think that would decrease their numbers very seriously.

Mr. GOULDEN. But if the rascal comes over with money in his pocket he would likely have a sufficient amount of money to pay any head tax that we might impose upon him.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. That is perfectly true, if he had enough. The more you charge him the less likely he is to come.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, as I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] he said a few moments ago that the representatives of these boarding-house keepers went to Europe and entered into a contract with these immigrants.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Not a contract in words.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Some sort of an arrangement.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. They say, "We will give you a job."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Clearly Congress can control contracts made between people of the several States and foreign countries.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Of course there is no question about that if the contract can be proved. The trouble is that you can not prove it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But we may make a law so severe that they will not make those contracts.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I have forgotten what the penalty is, but it is pretty big already.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then the law is not executed.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I am going to discuss, first, the restrictive remedies offered, not merely measures for the improvement in the quality of our immigration, but measures calculated to restrict the numbers coming in, whether they are good, bad, or indifferent.

First, there is a proposition before our committee introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS]. It provides that only a certain number shall come in from any one country of origin in any one year. His present bill provides that no more than 80,000 annually shall come from any country. That, of course, would include Italy, and so if it had been in force last year we should have had only 80,000 immigrants from that nation instead of 220,000.

My criticism—I do not say objection, because I do not want to pass final judgment upon anything until my committee has found what it is going to report—of the Adams bill would be this: The reports of our inspectors abroad show that certain foreign governments are directly involved in sending over these immigrants.

If we restrict the annual arrivals from Italy to 80,000, the chances are, if the Italian Government takes a hand in the matter, which it would, that we should get 80,000 of the worst instead of 80,000 of the best. That seems to be the main criticism on Mr. ADAMS'S bill. Otherwise, I like it very much for the reason that irrespective of race or country, if it had been the law last year, it would have cut down our immigration by about 500,000. That, I believe, would have been a very great benefit to this country at some time in the near future.

Another suggestion of value is contained in the bill introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS]. It has also been made by other people, and has a great deal of merit. The Hopkins bill provides that every man who goes through the Immigration Bureau at Ellis Island shall show to the inspector a certain amount of money, $50 perhaps. That requirement, Mr. HOPKINS claims, will cut down the number of arrivals, and, moreover, will enable the newcomer to wait a little while and take advantage of such opportunities as may arise instead of going to work at the first job offered for very low wages. There is merit in that suggestion.

Comparatively few of our immigrants last year had more than $50 in their pockets; yet, of course, the law might be constantly evaded if boarding-house keepers and importers of contract labor should lend an alien a sum of money sufficient to pass the inspector. It is true that they might not lend it. They might think it was too great a risk to take, especially if we impose a severe penalty for such an evasion. The immigrant might refuse to give up the money if some one on board the ship informed him that the padrone would not dare exact it.

Mr. GOULDEN. Does not the gentleman from Massachusetts think that the friends of these immigrants would manage to get that $50 across the water, with the easy means of transmitting money now, so that they would come in with the $50 every time. That is my experience in connection with other matters.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I dare say that might be the result in the case of that class of immigrants to whom I suspect that the gentleman alludes. I suppose he refers to the recent arrivals driven out of Russia. Still, there is a very great immigration coming into this country that does not come in through assistance rendered by friends or relatives, but through the assistance rendered directly or indirectly by would-be employers. In regard to the immigration to which I suppose the gentleman refers I think he is correct.

Mr. GOULDEN. Would the gentleman from Massachusetts kindly give some evidence on that point? My experience covering a number of years in watching Ellis Island closely has not been in keeping or in accord with the statement of the gentleman.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, if it were not for the fact that there are official reporters of this debate I could give the gentleman names in my own State.

Mr. GARRETT. Would it be at all practicable to have preliminary examination at the American consulates abroad?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. That question of inspection abroad is one on which the Committee on Immigration has expended a great deal of time. Personally, I am not convinced of its utility, but I think the majority of the Immigration Committee disagrees with me on that point.

The next remedy to be considered is the educational test. Two hundred and thirty-nine thousand people over 14 years of age, who could not read and write, came into this country last year. That is to say, 239,000 people, according to their own statements. If they had been subjected to any test I have no doubt that the number of illiterates would have appeared far greater. If their statements could be verified, I should not be at all surprised to find that three hundred and fifty or four hundred thousand illiterate persons over 14 years of age were admitted last year.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How soon does such a class of people as that—I mean the immigrants such as you describe—become voters in your State?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I think five years. The gentleman should understand, however, that unless a man can read and write he can not register as a voter in my State. Even if an illiterate could register he could not master our kind of Australian ballot. All other privileges of citizenship an illiterate can obtain in Massachusetts.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They have to read and write, both, in your State, and they can not vote unless they can do that, although they have registered?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Without wishing to digress too much from the topic in hand, I might say that in our State we require a voter to register. He must be able to read and write in order to do so. Even if a man without those qualifications were permitted to register, our form of ballot would automatically prevent him from casting his vote. However, I do not desire to get into a discussion of election laws.

To go on with the question of an educational test, I am not prepared to say that a man, because he can not read and write, is a poor citizen. I do hold, however, if there is anything in the theory that a man is a better citizen if he can read and write, that a group of 400,000 men who are not illiterate will prove better citizens than a group of the same number who are absolutely uneducated. Of course, there are plenty of individual cases to the contrary which gentlemen can cite, but when we speak of large bodies of men it stands to reason that that body, every one of whom can read or write, is a better body than the one containing a large percentage of illiterates.

Mr. MCNARY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] yield to his colleague [Mr. MCNARY]?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. MCNARY. On this particular point, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask my colleague from Massachusetts if he has clearly in mind the figures of the percentage of illiteracy among immigrants during the last few years, when the immigration has been very heavy, and the percentage of illiterate among native population of this country, both black and white; and if so, how do they compare?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I do not know. I do not think it is material to my argument. I simply say that we Americans, I believe correctly, think it is a good thing for a man to know how to read and write, and we believe he makes a better citizen for that reason.

I certainly believe that 400,000 men who can read and write constitute a better body of citizens than another group of 400,000 men, a large number of whom are absolutely uneducated. We are not discussing the exclusion of illiterate people already here. I do not assert that if we had had the educational test last year we should have cut down our immigration 400,000. We should not have done so. As an illustration, return to my boarding-house keeper. When he went over to Syria to secure twenty men, he would have secured persons who could read instead of securing men at random. It would have been more difficult, perhaps, but it could have been done.

Certainly we might not have obtained the full benefit of the educational test in regard to numbers, but, at all events, we should have obtained a better class of immigrants.

To my mind the most effective restrictive measure is a head tax. I believe we should impose a large head tax—say, $40. I shall not quarrel over the exact amount. I am simply arguing for real restriction of immigration, and I am willing to yield my judgment to that of other gentlemen if thereby a substantial and drastic bill can be secured.

If we impose a head tax of $40, we take the profit out of the padrone's importation. That sum would be nearly a prohibitive tariff on the article which he imports. If by any chance contract labor should get in after paying that $40 head tax, at all events it must be uncommonly good labor. Even if the law is broken it would necessarily be a good deal better contract labor than we are getting in now.

This large head tax must not apply to women. I should apply it only to adult males. I believe it to be a serious moral menace to this country that under present conditions two men are coming here for every woman. A man is not a celibate by nature. If he is obliged to choose between celibacy and license he will choose the latter.

There should be an equalization of the respective numbers of the two sexes coming into this country. I totally disagree with the view of those persons who say, "Why, the less women immigrants the better, for the less they breed." If we are going to admit aliens at all, and if we believe that any immigration is proper and advantageous, for Heaven's sake let them breed in a legitimate, monogamous manner instead of at random.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Is it not a fact that in your State and in many other States the number of women greatly exceeds the men?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Very slightly in percentage as compared to our whole population. Possibly by 75,000 out of a population of about 3,000,000.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. About 70,000, according to the last census.

Mr. McNARY. About 70,000.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. To turn to the question of selection, I believe that all these selective bills—and we have any number of them which say that a man shall be excluded because he has poor physique, or because he is imbecile, or because he is not accompanied by his parents and is less than 17 years old—are all very well in their way. The testimony of the immigration officials, and a rough calculation which anyone might make, shows that only a few thousand would be affected by the passage of the Dillingham bill.

New selective measures are well enough, but our immigration laws to-day are pretty good so far as they concern the exclusion of aliens proved to be mentally or morally unfit. Last year 820,000 aliens came into the port of New York. Every one was examined physically, yet out of that 820,000 only 39,000 had anything the matter with them. Of that 39,000 only 12,000 had anything serious the matter with them. The others were certified for minor disabilities, from the loss of one finger upward. Over 780,000 people physically perfect came into the port of New York last year, and yet gentlemen speak of raising the physical standard as a practical measure for cutting down the number of our immigrants.

Why, if the law last year had excluded every imperfect man you would only have cut 39,000 out of 820,000 that passed through Ellis Island.

There has been a plethora of talk about the distribution of immigration. The other afternoon I tried to point out to this House that the only way to distribute immigration was in response to the laws of supply and demand. It is no use for gentlemen to say, "The people down my way want labor, but it won't come there." "We should like to have the Swedes," they say, "but the Swedes do not come." "Why not dump them there; would they not stay?" Let me tell you that if you were to dump an American in that locality and he could get better wages elsewhere he would not stay, but would take the next train away. So it would be with the immigrant.

Population in the United States has always distributed itself, and will continue to do so, wherever it is best paid and whereever employment is steadiest. Gentlemen need feel no alarm as to the scarcity of labor in the industries of their States if they will offer wages which will yield steadily as good a standard of living as the wages offered elsewhere. It does not matter whether immigration is large or small, just as sure as the sun rises and sets it will stay in the States of New York and Pennsylvania just as long as the best jobs are to be found there.

A gentleman speaking from the floor the other day suggested a plan by which the Secretary of Commerce and Labor should be authorized to forbid immigrants settling in any city or town where 30 per cent of the population is foreign born. I doubt whether that would remedy the situation; but as the gentleman is not present I shall not discuss it further. Only one other suggestion for distribution has been received, actually only one—and, mind you, every report of the Commissioner-General of Immigration for years has talked "distribution, distribution, distribution.".

Until this year, so far as I know, we have never had a distributive bill before our committee. Not one practical measure, good, bad, or indifferent, because people when they come to figure distribution out find that it is governed by natural laws. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offered his 30 per cent settlement bill, and the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] and I, and possibly some other gentlemen as well, have offered distributive bills. What do you think my bill and that of Mr. HAYES amounts to? Nothing more than the establishment of intelligence offices at immigrant stations.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] such time as he desires, to have something read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to read in the time of the gentleman from Tennessee a petition to the Congress of the United States. It is:

A petition from the manufacturers of candles, wax lights, lamps, chandeliers, reflectors, snuffers, extinguishers; and from the producers of tallow, oil, rosin, alcohol, and generally of everything used for lights.

To the honorable the Members of the Congress of the United States.

GENTLEMEN: You are in the right way; you reject abstract theories; abundance, cheapness, and all that sort of thing concern you very little. You are entirely occupied with the interest of the producer, whom you are anxious to free from foreign competition. In a word, you wish to secure the national market to national labor.

We come now to offer you an admirable opportunity for the application of your—what shall we say? Your theory? No; nothing is more deceiving than theory. Your doctrine? Your system? Your principle? But you do not like doctrines; you hold systems in horror; and as for principles, you declare there are no such things in political economy. We will say, then, your practice; your practice without theory and without principle.

We are subjected, gentlemen of the House of Representatives, to the intolerable competition of a foreign rival who enjoys, it would seem, such superior facilities for the production of light that he is enabled to inundate our national market at so exceedingly reduced a price that the moment he makes his appearance he draws off all custom from us; and thus an important branch of American industry, with all its innumerable ramifications, is suddenly reduced to a state of complete stagnation. This rival, who is no other than the sun, carries on so bitter a war against us that we have every reason to believe that he has been excited to this course by our perfidious neighbor, England. In this belief we are confirmed by the fact that in all his transactions with this proud island of England he is much more moderate and careful than he is with us.

Our petition is that it would please your honorable body to pass a law whereby shall be directed the shutting up of all windows, dormers, skylights, shutters, curtains, vasistas, œil-de-bœufs; in a word, all openings, holes, chinks, and fissures through which the light of the sun is used to penetrate into our dwellings, to the prejudice of the profitable manufactures which we flatter ourselves we have been enabled to bestow upon the country; which country can not, therefore, without ingratitude, leave us now to struggle unprotected through so unequal a contest.

We pray your honorable body not to mistake our petition for a satire, nor to repulse us without at least hearing the reasons which we have to advance in its favor.

And first, if by shutting out as much as possible all access to natural light you thus create the necessity for artificial light is there in America an industrial pursuit which will not, through some connection with this important object, be benefited by it? If more tallow be consumed, there will arise a necessity for an increase of cattle and sheep. Thus artificial meadows must be in greater demand; and meat, wool, leather, and, above all, manure—this basis of all agricultural riches—must become more abundant.

If more oil be consumed, it will cause an increase in the cultivation of the olive tree. This plant, luxuriant and exhausting to the soil, will come in good time to profit by the increased fertility which the raising of cattle will have communicated to our fields.

Our heaths will become covered with resinous trees. Numerous swarms of bees will gather upon our mountains the perfumed treasures, which are now cast upon the winds, useless as the blossoms from which they emanate. There is, in short, no branch of agriculture which would not be greatly developed by the granting of our petition.

Navigation would equally profit. Thousands of vessels would soon be employed in the whale fisheries, and thence would arise a Navy capable of sustaining the honor of the United States and of responding to the patriotic sentiments of the undersigned petitioners, candle merchants, etc.

But what words can express the magnificence which Washington and New York will then exhibit? Cast an eye upon the future and behold the gildings, the bronzes, the magnificent crystal chandeliers, lamps, reflectors, and candelabra, which will glitter in the spacious stores, compared with which the splendor of the present day will appear trifling and insignificant.

There is none, not even the poor manufacturer of resin in the midst of his pine forests, nor the miserable miner in his dark dwelling, but who would enjoy an increase of salary and of comforts.

Gentlemen, if you will be pleased to reflect, you can not fail to be convinced that there is perhaps not one American, from the opulent stockholder of New York down to the poorest vender of matches, who is not interested in the success of our petition.

We foresee your objections, gentlemen, but there is not one that you can oppose to us which you will not be obliged to gather from the works of the partisans of "free trade." We dare challenge you to pronounce one word against our petition which is not equally opposed to your own practice and the principle which guides your policy.

Do you tell us that if we gain by this protection America will not gain, because the consumer must pay the price of it?

We answer you: You have no longer any right to cite the interest of the consumer. For whenever this has been found to compete with that of the producer you have invariably sacrificed the first. You have done this "to encourage labor," to increase the demand for labor. The same reason should now induce you to act in the same manner.

You have yourselves already answered the objection. When you were told the consumer is interested in the cheap introduction of iron, coal, corn, wheat, cloths, etc., your answer was: "Yes; but the producer is interested in their exclusion." Thus, also, if the consumer is interested in the admission of light, we, the producers, pray for its interdiction.

You have also said: "The producer and the consumer are one." If the manufacturer gains by protection he will cause the agriculturist to gain also; if agriculture prospers it opens a market for manufactured goods. Thus we, if you confer upon us the monopoly of furnishing light during the day, will as a first consequence buy large quantities of tallow, coals, oil, resin, wax, alcohol, silver, iron, bronze, crystal for the supply of our business, and then we and our numerous contractors having become rich our consumption will be great and will become a means of contributing to the comfort and competency of the workers in every branch of national labor.

Will you say the light of the sun is a gratuitous gift, and that to repulse gratuitous gifts is to repulse riches under pretense of encouraging the means of obtaining them?

Take care, you carry the deathblow to your own policy. Remember that hitherto you have always repulsed foreign produce because it was an approach to a gratuitous gift and the more in proportion as this approach was more close. You have, in obeying the wishes of other monopolists, acted only from a half motive; to grant our petition there is a much fuller inducement. To repulse us, precisely for the reason that our case is a more complete one than any which have preceded it, would be to lay down the following equation: $+ \times + = -$; in other words, it would be multiplying absurdity by absurdity and getting worse.

Labor and nature concur in different proportions, according to country and climate, in every article of production. The portion of nature is always gratuitous; that of labor alone regulates the price.

If a Lisbon orange can be sold at half the price of a New Jersey one, it is because a natural and gratuitous heat does for the one what the other only obtains from an artificial, and consequently expensive one.

When, therefore, we puchase a Portuguese orange we may say that we obtain it half gratuitously and half by the right of labor—in other words, at half price compared to those of New Jersey.

Now, it is precisely on account of this demigratuity (excuse the word) that you argue in favor of exclusion. How, you say, could national labor sustain the competition of foreign labor when the first has everything to do and the last is rid of half the trouble—the sun taking the rest of the business upon himself? If, then, the demigratuity can determine you to check competition, on what principle can the entire gratuity be alleged as a reason for admitting it. You are no logicians if, refusing the demigratuity as hurtful to human labor, you do not a fortiori and with double zeal reject the full gratuity.

Again, when any article, as coal, iron, cheese, or cloth, comes to us from foreign countries with less labor than if we produced it ourselves, the difference in price is a gratuitous gift conferred upon us; and the gift is more or less considerable, according as the difference is greater or less. It is the quarter, the half, or the three-quarters of the value of the produce, in proportion as the foreign merchant requires the three-quarters, the half, or the quarter of the price. It is as complete as possible when the producer offers, as the sun does with light, the whole in a free gift. The question is, and we put it formally, whether you wish for America the benefit of gratuitous consumption or the supposed advantages of laborious production?

Choose, but be consistent. And does it not argue the greatest inconsistency to check, as you do, the importation of coal, iron, cheese, and goods of foreign manufacture merely because and even in proportion as their price approaches zero, while at the same time you freely admit, and without limitation, the light of the sun, whose price is during the whole day at zero?

Mr. Chairman, last night, in reading an old book which was first published at Paris in 1846, I came across this petition to the Congress of the United States. It is true that it was not addressed in the title as a petition to the Congress of the United States, but was addressed to the legislative assembly of the Republic of France, but it struck me that it was curious that even that far back the sponsors of protection were talking just exactly as they are to-day, and it struck me that also then, perhaps as now, the easiest way to get rid of the arguments made by them was by the gentle and good-humored art of ridicule. Let us call the petition which I have read "The petition of Bastiab Americanized." I have taken the liberty, in reading, to change France to America, Paris to Washington, and New York and its neighborhood to New Jersey. There is not in any of this petition for the exclusion of the competition of the pauper heat and pauper light of the sun one single, solitary argument that I have not had in my time hurled at me from the other side of the Chamber, as a refutation of "Democratic free trade arguments"—that horrible thing; and as the writer of this petition says, why should a man who puts a prohibitive tariff upon oranges because God furnishes more heat somewhere else, so as to require less labor and therefore to grow oranges cheaper and more abundantly, not put a prohibitive tariff upon the heat itself?

My friends, I have heard but one new thing lately, and that comes, strangely enough, from a Republican, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], who just now proposes to put a tariff upon pauper labor itself. How late are you awakening to the idea that if it be right or necessary to exclude by taxation the products of what you call pauper labor in order that by making the products more scarce the price might rise, and that by reason of the price rising greater profits might be made for our manufacturers to share, if he will, with his labor? How long, I have frequently wondered, was it going to be until you had reached the idea of excluding labor, which is the source of wealth itself, because abundance of good and useful things is wealth, not their price nor their geography of production. It is the number of bushels of wheat, the number of pounds of cotton, and the number of yards of cloth, and the number of pounds of beef and pork that make people rich or poor, not the relative price of one with regard to the other. I wondered in my mind how long it was going to be before this Republican party, whose philosophy is that scarcity is wealth and that abundance is poverity, would finally come logically to the conclusion that if they were going to tax out of competition with the products of American labor the products of some other labor we ought also to tax out of competition with American labor foreign labor itself.

The only trouble, my friends, is that it is a world supply laid over as against a world demand for the labor of men that makes a world price, and that labor gets its wage just like anything else by setting off the demand for laborers against the supply of labor. That is no more illogical than the balance of your argument, and this petition is not less logical than all the other things you have been saying. I beg of you, in the words of the petitioners—these distinguished gentlemen engaged in French industries at that time, but in American industries now—not to regard their petition as satire, but as a grave and serious and logical following up of Republican practices, whereby we are taught that restriction makes riches and that abundance makes poverty; that the more things which you need you can keep away from you, or the higher you can make them sell, the better off you are. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee has forty-one minutes remaining.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, recurring to the bill that is now before the committee, I feel that it is not only my duty as a citizen, but my duty as a Member of Congress under oath to try at least to walk up to the mark and do my full duty under oath as near as I can, and try and remedy the evil that we have been conjuring here with for several Congresses, and which has been so aggressively grasped and treated by the recommendations which we have before us in this bill. I have not been able to read the bill in detail, to get exactly at its words, but the debate of yesterday shows we are confronted with a very distressing condition, with an actually terrible condition, one that is shocking to every Member of this House, that is distressing to each and all of us. Men on the street stop and talk to you about it, as they did to me this morning. Go into the Departments, as I did to-day—some of the leading Departments—and they will tell you that they have employees that are wholly unfit to attend to the duties that they formerly attended to. I am very much surprised to find that in the Department of Commerce and Labor, which we just created a few days ago, a majority, I think—and if I am incorrect in this, I desire that somebody will correct me—certainly a great number of the clerks are over 65 years of age.

There are a number of columns of the names of these employees, as printed in the hearings which I have before me, but I shall not take up the time of the committee nor space in the RECORD to read to this House, but in that young Department, the most youthful of all our Departments, there are very few—I will say half a page—of the employees who have served from one to three years, and that in the next half of that page and on the other pages the employees are shown to have been in the service of the Government from twenty-five to thirty years, and they are at least 65 years years of age and over. How these aged employees were employed in such a youthful Department—and I am not criticising the Department now; I guess it obeyed the law—but how so many aged men got into that Department I am at a loss to know.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; I am trying to get all the light I can, and I am happy to get it from any source.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is because various bureaus and departments of the Government already in existence and under the operation of some other heads were transferred to the Bureau of Commerce and Labor with the aged employees.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, now, that is one explanation, and a good one—that they took the old employees out of some other bureau or, rather, shifted some other department into this with this result in part; but I notice that in the Department of Manufactures, if I remember correctly, there are very few who had been in the service but a very few years who are very old.

Gentlemen, here is an actual condition. I want to say in passing it would be well for all of you Members to read over the hearings on this point. I have not time to go further into them, but I am giving you some of the rough outlines so we can all, intelligently, I hope, and patriotically, and justly to the Government first, attempt to solve this matter if we can.

Let us take an assumed case. Here, say, is an old soldier—and I want to say I have just as much respect for an old soldier as any of you, and I guess I have as many kin people, and have had them ever since the day of the Revolution down to this time, as any of you, who have been old soldiers, and young ones too, all the way from 13 to 65, who have strapped on the buckle and carried their swords into the battles of this country. Now, here is an old soldier, we will say, for example, in a Department who is wholly inefficient from old age, and yet he draws his salary and sits there, of course, ready to do his duty, but wholly unable to do it. Now, as a result of that, either his work is not done—which we know is not the case, for of all governments that have ever existed in the world I think our departmental government, so far as rapidity and correctness of service is concerned, excels any in the world—you have to employ another clerk to sit by the side of that old man to do his work. Now, that is the very natural result.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether the gentleman suggests simply some possible case or has the gentleman in mind any case of the kind which the gentleman assumes?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I stated to the committee I assumed a case.

Mr. KEIFER. You assumed a case?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I assumed a case.

Mr. KEIFER. I only wanted to have it well understood that there are no such cases; that it would be impossible, and if it should be it could be easily corrected.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, is that in the report? I say, with all due respect to the gentleman's word and intelligence, I do not find any such information in the record that there are no such cases. On the contrary, I will say to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio that the presumption is that my assumed statement is presumptively more correct than incorrect, because here is this investigation made by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. TAWNEY], and, I want to say, a faithful, intelligent, able, and courageous chairman he is, and I congratulate this House on having such a man as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] as chairman of that committee.

Mr. KEIFER. All that may be true, but there is no reason, unless it is in the record, for your assumed existence of any such case; on the contrary, I am perfectly well advised of more than a dozen cases where the most competent men in the War Department and in the Pension Department are old soldiers.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall assume that the gentleman from Ohio has been into all the Departments and inquired into this specific question before I shall be governed by what the gentleman so flatly states as a fact. I will state, Mr. Chairman, I have not been in the Departments, and I will state furthermore that I am not going into the Departments—unless required by law—and embarrass these dear old men by asking them how old they are and whether they attend to their duties or not. I will not do that. But I again state—I know of no case—but assumed a case, a possible case—and proceeded to show the results following in an actual case, if any.

But, Mr. Chairman, I will say that over two years, or about two years ago, when the question of pensioning these old people—men and women—was up before the House, I was approached by one of the leading Members of this House, well known to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], and he asked if I would support the measure. I said no, that it would be absolutely an endless pension system if we did, and gave him my other reasons. The military pension is supposed to end some time. The Mexican pensions are ending very rapidly and the Revolutionary pensions are practically ended, because all of the soldiers are dead. But a civil pension would continue as long as we continue as a Government, because people are constantly employed in the Departments and would constantly reach the age where they were totally inefficient and have the right to draw their pension, and then resign and draw that pension. So it would continue ad infinitum, like a great Niagara rushing through the Treasury Department at all times. But that gentleman said to me, "Mr. GAINES, I am reliably informed that there are 1,765 employees in the Departments here at Washington that are wholly unable to do their work, and we have got to do something." Now, that is what he said to me. He had investigated the matter. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] well said to-day we are confronted with a condition that we must meet. We have a pension law—or rule, rather—Mr. Chairman, that says when "soldiers" reach a certain age—I believe it is 62, or it may be 70—I will ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER]——

Mr. KEIFER. Sixty-two, 65, 68, and 70.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, when a soldier reaches the age of 70 the effect of that order is to say: "You are entitled to a pension." Why? "You are unable to work, worn-out." That man, Mr. Chairman, is the old hero. That is the man who was once the splendid specimen of physical and mental and military manhood—such a magnificent manhood, I may say, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] is the embodiment of to-day. But is not the gentleman an unusual exception to the rule physically and mentally, I may say? But the soldier, Mr. Chairman, is selected to be a soldier because of his splendid physique, because of his muscle and his health and his vigor and his splendid heredity. Why? Because he must suffer all the privations and take all the punishments of bad weather and half rations, possibly, and of storm and hot sun, and of the struggles of bloody fighting. But how about the great body of the people that are left behind because unable to qualify to be a soldier? From this class many Department employees are selected, already weak in strength and poor in health.

The soldier element in the Departments, I am told, is a very small element. It is bound to be very small. How about those that have not the splendid physique of the soldier to start with when he reaches the age of 70 or reaches the age of 65? Does he hold up like the soldier? I should say, naturally, no.

There are exceptions, it is true—there are exceptions to all rules—and there might be some limitation to dismissing anyone at 70.

There might be some provision put into the law by which a man when he reaches 70, if he is capable and vigorous and able to attend to his duties, might be reexamined or might be continued; but, Mr. Chairman, I contend, and I am practically safe in saying, that where these people are unable to attend to their business an assistant secretary or special clerk is put by their side to attend to the business of the clerk who from age or infirmity can not do it. Common sense would argue this is true.

Now, let us see. Here is a case right in the RECORD of yesterday. I will read from page 3813, as follows:

Mr. TAWNEY. There are men in the service drawing $1,600 who are 85 years of age, who have been furloughed and have not done a stroke of work for several years.

"Several years"—a general term. The actual facts might show he has been furloughed for ten years. There are "men"—not one man, but "men"—furloughed and can not work. Now, this came out in a colloquial debate yesterday. So there is not one case, but cases, a "circumstance," at least, a good lawyer would say—and, as I know, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] is such—which tends to show that there are other cases, which fact or facts would cause us to apprehend that when these people reach the age of 70 years they are not able to master these great columns of figures and do the mental work that ought to be done. The gentleman's statement clearly shows we should reform our laws and execute them.

The Government pays these "men" thus furloughed their regular salaries. The Government must also pay for a regular clerk to do the work that these poor old "men" are unable to do. This salary to these "men" is a pension in effect—a civil pension.

Now, let us go a step further. I have been trying since yesterday to work out some means by which we can relieve the situation, but I have not had the time to do so. My heart is appealed to just as much as that of any other man. I feel very keenly the situation, but we brought it upon ourselves by permitting this civil-service life tenure. These employees came here voluntarily. They took the civil-service examinations voluntarily; they remain in this office voluntarily; they know each month, for life, they get so much salary, as the law stands; hence they spend all their salaries voluntarily, regardless of "rainy days," and when age comes on and they have nothing in the world to show for it, they expect the Government not simply to pension them and retire them. That is not the proposition. We hear that proposition made, but, gentlemen, what are you doing? You are continuing in the Departments people who are unable, presumptively, to do their work, and when they reach 70 years you say they must be turned out, and in the meantime extra help is employed to do their work. Here is a great book of names in the Department showing the immense number of people to-day who are 65 years and upward. Are they unable to work? Who says they are? No one, so far.

I will read from page 31 of the hearings of the committee.

Employees in Washington who have reached the age of 65 years and over.

| Total | 1,607 | 1,986,177.06 | 1,235.95 |

This, again, gentlemen, is some evidence going to show the truth of the statement that was made to me two years ago that there were 1,765 employees in the Departments who were unable to do their work. That is "some evidence," if the statement made to me was true, and shows we must reform our Departments or more "furloughs" must be given from day to day, year to year.

Now, then, let us take the case of the soldier. If found incapable of carrying on his work we pay his salary right along, and put a clerk to do the work that he ought to do and can not do; and then what else? We are running, at a heavy expense, magnificent Soldiers' Homes all over this country, similar, I dare say, to that run as a State institution in the State of Ohio, that has always had her great soldiers and properly takes care of them when they are unable to work in private or public business. So there are three expenses—at least two—with the soldier directly—the payment of his salary, the payment of the clerk's salary, and this Home, which he can enter when he desires. He may have no home of his own. We have built and run one for him that has been builded by the hand of affection and with hearts of gratitude—a monument to soldier and nation alike. But how about the broken-down employee who has no private home? There is no home for the plain citizen employee that must at 70 leave the Department, none built in Tennessee or any State, and none built in the District of Columbia, cared for by the Federal Government, for the benefit of the citizen after he retires from the Department.

But there is one for the soldier. He is cared for by a generous and grateful public, and to be an inmate of the Soldier's Home is no disgrace, but an honor.

Now, you see, gentlemen, if he can not do his work, and he can not do it, what it will cost this Government. The Government was not made to give a man a living. It used to be the law that men held office without salary; they were compelled, as good citizens, to take charge of the office and run it pro bono publico.

Holding office vests no man with a "property" in the office. The office is created for the benefit of the people and not the officeholder.

The committee has brought in a bill that proposes to retire all employees at the age of 70. Let us go a step further. They found the disease. They found there are 1,025 employees in the Departments who if not now will soon be in such a condition that they can not carry on the business of the Government. But, gentlemen, the committee falls short of going far enough up or down to locate the cause of or seat of the disease. There is nothing better settled in medicine than if you "remove the cause of the disease you cure the disease." That is one of the axioms in medicine.

What has brought about this condition? It is by giving, under the civil-service law, life tenure, a policy that was utterly condemned and repudiated by our forefathers when they built the Constitution in 1787. Why, Mr. Hamilton wanted a king for this country, to hold office during life, and he came very near getting some such law as that embodied in the Constitution. And he wanted one House of Congress for life. Finally, after they had time and again decided the President should have one term of six or seven years and be reeligible why they compromised, to get rid of the reeligibility proposition, by agreeing to the four-year proposition, instead of six or seven, I forget which, and "silence" in the report as to the right of reeligibility, thus allowing the right of reelection every four years. Thus giving Mr. Hamilton some success in perpetuating the President but as long as the American people would reelect him.

Instead of electing him for life, as Hamilton's idea was, the law was fixed so the people could elect him every four years, or as long as the American people desired. And, Mr. Chairman, Washington himself prepared to decline a second term, and only because of peculiar exigencies of threatening foreign complications he finally yielded at the persuasion of Jefferson and Madison and others who were opposed to the plan and policy of reelecting the President; but their reason was that Washington was the impersonation practically of all that was great in this country and had more influence abroad than anybody. They said: "You are the man to settle our foreign complications; you must remain President."

He did so, but he wisely declined a third term. He served eight years and was elected—not appointed, but here are men in the Departments who have been perpetuated in our Departments for thirty-odd years, and have drawn their salaries all that time, and there is no effective way to get them out. You say they have done good work. I say yes, and got good salaries; faithful, good work, yes, but the Government was not made to give any man an office or keep him in it to make a living. It was not made for any man to make a living out of it. I do not know anybody who is making one out of it.

So, gentlemen, the committee rather suggests a cure for the immediate conditions, in 1913. Suppose we make that the law. The committee fails to suggest an ounce of prevention. It suggests no remedy for a recurrence of the "present" status; nothing to prevent its continuation.

The committee does not say that the employees hereafter shall serve six years and then retire, or ten years and then retire. There is not one suggestion, as I understand this bill, faithfully gone over and intelligently constructed as it is, there is not a scintilla of prevention of a continuation of the very trouble that is now before our door, and with which we are grappling and which appeals to our hearts and heads with such force.

If in the beginning, when we had passed our civil-service law, we had said that no man should serve in a Department longer than six years, or a givin length of time, every man, woman, and child who had come into the Departments then would have known, "Well, my head goes off at the end of six years; I will take care of my salary; I will equip myself with an education in telegraphy or stenography or typewriting, or in bookkeeping, and at the end of six years I will have a little salary saved up, or if not I then can go back to the farm or go to the manufacturing establishments. I will be a professional stenographer and typewriter; I will be a professional bookkeeper; I will be a clerk;" or, as I have known in a number of cases right in the city of Washington, young boys have come here and gone into the Departments and worked during the day and gone to school at night, and stayed here five or six years, until they were educated and have graduated in law or in something else, and then have quit Washington and gone back home, and to-day they are leading citizens, leading lawyers or business men of the State of Tennessee.

It was unfortunate, I say, gentlemen, that some such wholesome limitation was not put upon that law. Why, only a few days ago a clerk who has been here about six months said to me: "Mr. GAINES, I am going back home. This is no place for me; there is not enough latitude and longitude for me here; my actions are restrained too much; I am a mere clerk and will so remain; I want to go back to the mountains, to the bluegrass region, to the silver springs of Tennessee, where I will have all the rights and latitude and longitude that any American citizen can have. I won't throw away my life in this work."

Mr. WACHTER. Will not the gentleman admit that a good employee is more valuable at the end of six years than he is at the end of six months?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; and I will admit that somebody just as competent as you are or as I am can come to Congress from our country, and we are not here for life, and I am glad we are not. We are elected every two years. The people have a chance to weigh us—turn us out or not. Not so under civil service—once in, always in, until death overtakes them. There is a great difference in the elective and life appointees.

And I wish, Mr. Chairman, that it was so that we could turn out some of our other officials a little oftener than we are allowed to turn them out. It is a great weakness, I believe, in our Federal judiciary that we did not adopt the wholesome English system of appointing a judge, say, for ten years, with the legal right to be again appointed, but again confirmed by the confirmatory power. Jefferson often cited this omission and condemned it.

Mr. Chairman, time and again, out of my kindness of heart, I hope, and out of the wisdom of my head, I trust, I have advised young men to stay back in Tennessee. To cast their fortunes there. Come up from her rich soil under her sunshine amidst her good citizenship. Make of themselves there lawyers, doctors, preachers, farmers, school-teachers, rather than come here to draw the pittance of a little salary and fritter it away at theaters, as thousands of the people of the city of Washington do who are not able to make buckle and tongue meet. [Applause.] I know exactly what I am talking about. I have seen all this. It is a very unfortunate social condition. This is the most spendthrift city in the United States. Whether a man is rich or poor he is obliged to go to the theater regularly. He is obliged to do this because he sees the millionaires doing it. He is obliged to do that, he is obliged to do this, that, and the other, or he is not "in society." Now, Mr. Chairman, I am talking facts. I am under oath; I have a solemn responsibility before me. My duty is first to my country, the Constitution, and the flag. I challenge any man to show where in my career in Congress I have turned a deaf ear to real charity when I had a nickel to give. I challenge any man to point to a man, woman, or child, black or white, to whom I have turned an unwiling hand when I could turn it at all within the law's limit.

In this matter we should not turn our hearts into a lot of mush and let sentiment run away with us and go along here and permit a confessed disease to run its course ad infinitum, to go on forever. I say we should stop it; that we should put some limitation upon this business of holding office continually in the Departments at Washington.

Why, you will see splendid young men from all over the country come here and stay a short while; their skins get to be as fair as our sweet girls, their hands as soft as the down on the wings of night, but they soon get into fixed expensive habits. They spend all they make. They have the legal right to do it, but when old age comes they are going to be pinched, as all of us will be if we stay in Congress. Poverty will get all of us. What a sad life it is when you look back at the final days of many illustrious men who have spoken here in this Hall, long since dead and buried, lying in graves we hardly know where, buried by their friends, with nothing but a shingle to mark the spot, and that rotting down, perhaps.

We have had Cabinet officers afterwards filling little third or fourth class post-offices to keep them out of the poorhouse. I have one distinguished Democrat in mind just now—a southern man.

Gentlemen, I insist—and I say it in all kindness and candor, without the intention to be harsh or hard or to hurt anybody's feelings, without intending to be unkind to a single employee—I say this life in Washington is a life that only a rich man can pursue as it is pursued by many of these employees. It is not the life for a Department clerk. And I may say that it is not the life that the average Member of Congress should follow long, unless he expects to do otherwise than walk home or ride on a pass—and I hope to God they will stop the latter before we get away from here. [Laughter.]

So, gentlemen, we are called on now to vote for a bill that continues the cause of this condition; that continues the condition that makes the trouble; continues alive, as it were, the germ that is causing the disease which the legislative doctors are here treating without putting one ounce of extermination into the bill. The reason why they do not put some limitation into the bill—the reason why they haven't done it heretofore—is because, they say, "we can not pass it." In other words, we can not pass a law to prevent a man from holding office in a Department as long as he lives or until he gets to be 70 years of age and is unable to run the office.

What is the matter? "Pressure?" Are we afraid? Gentlemen, I have never seen the day yet. When the time comes that I shall act the moral coward toward the great people I have the honor to represent in a humble way, before I shall shirk from responsibility for fear of adverse "pressure" at the ballot box, whether that responsibility is to turn a poor man out of the Department because he can not do his duty, or deny the best friend on earth the favor that he asks for the same reason, I will take my hat and go back and surrender my credentials without stain or taint, to the great people who sent me here. [Applause.]

Go to either of the Departments and you will find men who will talk to you in whispers and say that "something ought to be done" in this matter. To-day it was whispered in my ears by one of the leaders of the Departments of this Government "that the evil must be remedied;" and yet we sit here and do nothing but turn these people out into the shock field at the age of 70, practically knowing God Almighty will take them out of the Department before then, and hence we say 1913!

If you don't put an ounce of prevention in this bill, if you don't put something into the statute to prevent the condition coming along again, of course it will continue; like Banquo's ghost, it will not down, because you don't remove the cause.

Why, look at it! Look at what the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] said yesterday. Nobody disputes it. He says that Mr. Ware, the Commissioner of Pensions from Kansas, a gentleman and an old soldier himself, said that he could not turn out these people because of "humanity and pressure." Who is pressing? I am going to ask my friend from New York [Mr. LITTAUER], who with such punctiliousness and ability explained the bill reported to this House, what he meant by "pressure?"

Mr. LITTAUER. I mean simply the pressure which is brought to bear upon him by Members of this House and of another that the gentleman knows of.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Certainly. So, gentlemen, we are ourselves accused, rightfully or wrongfully, by this Commissioner with passing a law and then going around behind the house and preventing him from executing it. I have no doubt but that "pressure" was brought to bear on the Members and then the Members pressed Mr. Ware; but, gentlemen, I do say that the exigency is upon us, and when the American people reads in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the public prints the statement that comes from the lips of Mr. Ware and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], they will rightfully ask us why we allowed this to occur and why we allow it to continue.

Mr. Chairman, I have seen some of these employees come up in their wagonettes to these Departments, and thus sit, if I mistake not, at their desks all day long, poor victims of disease. I have seen some lifted in and out of their wagons. I have seen them come up in carriages, because they are wholly unable to walk. In almost every case I believe it was an extremely old person. You let this thing go on and have it go out to the country, as it ought to go, that a few old or young men are drawing from $1,600 to $2,000 a year and are upon "furlough" at home doing nothing, and what do you think the country will think? What would the people have the right to think?

Gentlemen, I am willing to do my part in trying to relieve the situation. I confess I do not know exactly the details of the needed reform. I did not know conditions were as bad as shown. I am glad that the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER], and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] have had the courage and the industry to bring this matter to light. I suggest that there should be some limitation placed in the law to prevent this condition from continuing, because, like the course of a mighty river, it will continue as long as a life tenure continues under civil service. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] suggested a proposition to appoint a civil service commission, or something was said about a civil service commission by one of the speakers yesterday, to pass upon and execute this law. Why, gentlemen, would a commission have any more courage and hardihood than we? Instead of a civil service commission it would be a civil "bird" commission, because the members of that so-called commission would have hearts like we have, hearts that can be and that were made to be reached by a crying woman and a hungry man, and hence our oaths to keep and force us to do our duty in an hour of such and all trials as lawmakers.

I do not take much to that Civil Service Commission to execute this law, or to any other board. We simply have got to put a limit on the matter and let the law execute itself. When we do that then we will have the law self-executory, and these people will be told that they are ineligible when they come within its limitations, and it will enforce itself. We have hearts ourselves, and have been guilty, it is said, of bending the timbers of the law. It seems to me that we ought to have the courage to put a law there that will not be bent or that will not be left to the discretion of any man. There are prohibitions in the Constitution against the Federal Government, against the States, and against the people. Certainly we can put a prohibition in the statute that will at least prevent Members from bending the timbers of the law and visiting this condition of things upon the American people and the American Treasury. [Applause.]

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16472—the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect on and after July 1, 1906.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRYE. I ask that the letter of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor accompanying the report on this bill may be printed in the RECORD. It explains the necessity of the bill.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, March 13, 1906.

Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE,
Chairman Committee on Commerce, United States Senate.

SIR: The Department has received your letter of the 7th instant, inclosing S. 4885, a bill relating to tonnage-tax exemptions. Complying with your request to furnish the committee with such suggestions as I may deem proper touching the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage, I have to state:

The several acts proposed to be repealed provide in brief that the United States will exempt from tonnage dues vessels coming from any foreign country or place in which American vessels are exempt from tonnage dues or equivalent charges. In fact, during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1905, in ports of the United States American vessels paid $79,578.54 in tonnage dues, while foreign vessels paid $779,958.05. If the principle of reciprocal tonnage-tax exemption were generally applied American vessels would save about one dollar in tonnage taxes at home for each $10 saved to foreign vessels. In foreign ports the relative saving would be about the same, though the total amounts saved to shipping abroad would be somewhat greater, as foreign tonnage charges are, as a rule, heavier than American charges. Accordingly, the laws proposed to be repealed by the bill are a plain misapplication of the theory of reciprocity.

The countries with which, under proclamations by the President, reciprocal exemptions from tonnage dues have been established since 1885 are:

1. Kingdom of the Netherlands.—Foreign vessels aggregating 778,628 net tons entered the United States from ports in that Kingdom during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1904 (latest figures available). No American vessels entered from or cleared for such ports during that year. The exemption, accordingly, was worth upward of $40,000 to foreign vessels (rate 6 cents per ton) and not a dollar to American vessels.

2. Ports in the Dutch East Indies.—Foreign entries, 89,580 net tons; American entries and clearances, none; saving to foreign shipping (6 cents per ton), about $5,400.

3. Copenhagen.—Foreign entries from Denmark, 91,275 net tons; no American entries or clearances; saving to foreign shipping (6 cents per ton), about $5,400.

4. Greytown, Nicaragua; islands of Montserrat and Guadeloupe, West Indies.—Entries inconsiderable and not separately stated, but mostly foreign.

5. Province of Ontario.—Entries not separately stated. Total tonnage entries for Quebec (taxable), Ontario (exempt), and Manitoba (taxable), foreign, 3,002,266; American, 2,590,604 (rate, 3 cents for five entries a year). Value of exemption can not be stated. The actual tonnage taxes collected at lake ports on vessels from the Province of Quebec during the fiscal year 1904 was $8,829.36. The exemption of vessels from Ontario, accordingly, did not much, if any, exceed $24,000, divided about equally between American and foreign vessels.

6. Republic of Panama.—Vessels from the City of Panama bound to American ports on the Pacific practically without exemption stop at intermediate Central American or Mexican ports, and thus become subject to the tax at present. On the Atlantic side trade is conducted chiefly by our new Government merchant fleet of steamers. Panama, however, so far as this bill is concerned, is not of immediate consequence, as under the treaty Congress will doubtless define precisely the status of the Canal Zone as nonforeign, if not fully American.

The present importance of the bill rests on the possibility of British action. In order to obtain the reciprocal privilege a bill to abolish British light dues failed in 1903 by the close vote of 103 to 114. A similar bill on January 14, 1904, passed the House of Commons by a vote of 66 to 62, but the Government prevented its passage by the House of Lords. It is reasonably probable that in a short time British light dues will be repealed for the benefit of British shipping both at home and in the United States through exemptions from tonnage dues due to the acts to be repealed.

The bill also repeals section 4232 of the Revised Statutes, reading:

"The mail steamships employed in the mail service between the United States and Brazil shall be exempt from all port charges and custom-house dues at the port of departure and arrival in the United States if, and so long as, a similar immunity from port charges and custom-house dues is granted by the Government of Brazil."

As there have been no American mail steamers in trade with Brazil for some years, the law has long been a dead letter. Should it be revived by the establishment of an American mail line under the most favored nation clause other nations, under like conditions, might claim the right to the exemption proposed to be repealed.

The passage of the bill has been recommended in reports of the Commissioner of Navigation for some years past, and the Department concurs in the recommendation.

Respectfully, V. H. METCALF, Secretary.

CAPT. EJNAR MIKKELSEN.

Mr. GALLINGER. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 4954) authorizing Capt. Ejnar Mikkelsen to act as master of an American vessel, and I submit a report thereon.

Mr. FRYE. The bill is only about five lines long, and there can not possibly be any objection to it. The Geographical Society proposes to make investigations in the Antarctic Sea, and they want this captain, who has filed his intention to become an American citizen, but can not complete his citizenship before the ship will be obliged to sail. They desire to have this man sail on a particular ship, and that ship alone, to the Antarctic Sea.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes Capt. Ejnar Mikkelsen to act as master of any vessel of the United States purchased by him while on an expedition in her to the Beaufort Sea, any act of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER DAM.

Mr. NELSON. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 15649) extending the time for the construction of the dam across the Mississippi River authorized by the act of Congress approved March 12, 1904, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration. It is a very short bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that subject to all the other provisions contained in the act of Congress entitled "An act permitting the building of a dam across the Mississippi River between the counties of Wright and Sherburne, in the State of Minnesota," approved March 12, 1904, the time limitation for the construction and completion of the dam authorized by the act shall be extended until December 31, 1908.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. TILLMAN. What is the order of business, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Reports of standing or select committees.

Mr. TILLMAN. I can not present it as the report of a committee because it is not a regulation matter. I wish to submit a report which embodies my own opinions on the rate-regulating bill and also in connection therewith the views of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. I present it and ask that it may be printed.

Mr. ALDRICH. Are the Senator's own views very long?

Mr. TILLMAN. No, sir; not very long.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that they might be read.

Mr. TILLMAN. While I feel complimented that the Senator from Rhode Island should wish to hear my views, I think it probably would be better to have them printed, and then if Senators wish to take any interest in the matter they could follow it by having printed copies.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have naturally had, as a member of the committee, a great deal of curiosity about the Senator's personal views on the bill. I am very much interested in his present attitude with reference to the measure. Therefore I thought perhaps the Senate might desire to hear the paper read.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am perfectly willing to have it read.

Mr. ALDRICH. But if the Senator prefers to have it printed, I withdraw my suggestion.

Mr. TELLER. Let us have it read.

Mr. PATTERSON. Let it be read.

Mr. TILLMAN. Senators seem to wish to hear it. I have no objection to have it read and go into the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the views submitted by the Senator from South Carolina.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. TILLMAN, having reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce House bill 12987 without amendment, submits his views thereon as follows:

The peculiar circumstances under which this bill was reported to the Senate from the Committee on Interstate Commerce make it a difficult and somewhat embarrassing task to write a report upon it.

Instead of being amended in committee, as is usual, so as to command the indorsement and support of a majority of its members, the bill was brought into the Senate in a form not entirely satisfactory to more than two members. Party lines in the committee were broken down and the bill is in the Senate by reason of the union of five members of the minority party and three members of the majority party in Congress who concurred in reporting it favorably; and while these eight Senators are agreed as to the general purpose and scope of the bill, there are radical differences among them as to the amendments that ought to be incorporated in it to make it fully adequate to meet the demands of the business interests of the country at this time.

This lack of harmony among the supporters of the bill—it would be speaking with more accuracy to say the supporters of the policy involved in the bill—brings about the anomalous situation in which a member of the minority party in Congress is put in charge in the Senate of proposed legislation which is generally regarded throughout the country as the cherished scheme of the President, with whose general policy and principles that member is not in accord. At the same time the bill is designed to carry into effect his own long-cherished convictions and the thrice-reiterated demands of the party to which he belongs.

This condition is without precedent in our legislative history, and brings into prominence the fact that the proposed legislation is nonpartisan, and this is emphasized by the further fact that this specific bill received the unanimous support of the minority party, and only lacked seven votes of a unanimous indorsement of both parties at the other end of the Capitol. It therefore follows, if events shall prove that this measure has broken down party lines in both branches of Congress, that the conclusion will be almost inevitable that it will be framed so as to accomplish the results intended or claimed to be intended by both parties, and to this end Democrats and Republicans alike should bend all their energies and lend all that is best in them to perfecting and passing so important a piece of legislation.

There is undoubtedly a widespread demand for immediate action by Congress along this line, and the clamor for action which has been gathering force for several years is now such as to threaten a very cyclone of passionate resentment should the representatives of the people in the House and of the States in the Senate fail in any essential particular to give that relief to the country which is so earnestly demanded. Woe be unto that member of the Senate or of the House whose work in formulating this legislation shall be that of a timeserving politician without earnestness or honesty of purpose and who shall seek to belittle the question or kill the bill by subterfuge and deception. The people want the railroads regulated. The Constitution gives the power to regulate the railroads to Congress. There are many wrongs to right, many grievances to redress, and a great opportunity for beneficent legislation.

The bill as it comes to us from the House is loosely worded and capable of different interpretations, as shown by the debate already had upon it. The subject is complex and deals with one of the most, indeed the most, important matter that affects the industrial development and progress of the nation. The House has sent us a bill which many Senators believe is inadequate. It is the duty of the Senate to take it in hand and make such amendments to it as shall produce the best possible law and relieve the distress and wrong the existence of which no one will deny. In what has already been said and what shall follow the Senator in charge of the bill can claim to give expression to no opinion except his own.

THE PRESIDENT'S ATTITUDE.

The object sought to be obtained by this proposed legislation can be best outlined in the language of the President in his last annual message to Congress:

"The immediate and most pressing need, so far as legislation is concerned, is the enactment into law of some scheme to secure to the agents of the Government such supervision and regulation of the rates charged by the railroads of the country engaged in interstate traffic as shall summarily and effectively prevent the imposition of unjust or unreasonable rates. It must include putting a complete stop to rebates in every shape and form. * * *

"The first consideration to be kept in mind is that the power should be affirmative and should be given to some administrative body created by the Congress. * * *

"In my judgment, the most important provision which such law should contain is that conferring upon some competent administrative body the power to decide, upon the case being brought before it, whether a given rate prescribed by a railroad is reasonable and just, and if it is found to be unreasonable and unjust, then, after full investigation of the complaint, to prescribe the limit of rate beyond which it shall not be lawful to go—the maximum reasonable rate, as it is commonly called—this decision to go into effect within a reasonable time and to obtain from thence onward, subject to review by the courts. * * *

"A heavy penalty should be exacted from any corporation which fails to respect an order of the Commission. I regard this power to establish a maximum rate as being essential to any scheme of real reform in the matter of railway regulation. The first necessity is to secure it, and unless it is granted to the Commission there is little use in touching the subject at all."

The bill as it is presented to the Senate is the bill that was reported to the House by its Committee on Interstate Commerce and passed by that body without amendment, and it is generally supposed to embody the well-digested views of the Executive and those leaders of his party whose advice he consents to take. There are in it some essential changes of the original interstate-commerce law—the act of 1887. These are designed to place under the jurisdiction of the Commission all switches, terminal facilities, private car lines, elevators, and any and all other facilities for transportation or shipment or storing merchandise, in order to prevent the public carriers from utilizing such instrumentalities for purposes of discrimination or extortion. These amendments to the old law by those who have examined the question closely have been thought necessary to secure the best possible regulation of interstate commerce in a manner to prevent injustice and wrong to shippers.

Another important amendment is the extension of the time required for a change in rates from ten to thirty days' public notice, the requirement to be subject to modification by the Commission for good cause shown.

For information as to the parliamentary history of the bill in the House of Representatives and generaly concerning the subject discussed reference is made to the House report made by Mr. HEPBURN, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce (Report No. 591, Fifty-ninth Congress, 1st session).

THE VITAL QUESTION.

The most radical change proposed in the new legislation is to be found in section 15, in which power is sought to be vested in the Commission "after full hearing upon a complaint made to determine and prescribe what will in its judgment be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate" "to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged," and to make an order that the same shall go into effect and remain in force for three years, which order shall "go into effect thirty days after notice to the carrier and shall remain in force and be observed by the carrier, unless the same shall be suspended or modified or set aside by the Commission, or be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction."

Around the first provision the most earnest and exciting contention has arisen and there is great difference of opinion as to the scope of this clause and the executive powers of the Commission under it. On the one hand, it is claimed most positively that Congress can not delegate its powers to the Commission and thus authorize it to fix a rate, while on the other hand it is asserted with equal earnestness and force that this power is indisputable. Whatever may be the results of this discussion in the Senate if the bill becomes a law the final determination of the question at issue must be made by the Supreme Court. The friends of the proposed legislation feel no uneasiness on this point, but in addition there remains the equally great difference of opinion and even greater solicitude upon the question of judicial review.

For the purposes of this report the two contending ideas may be briefly considered. The friends of the proposed legislation are equally earnest with its opponents in desiring to throw every protection around the billions of capital invested in railways of the United States. There is no purpose or desire anywhere to deprive them of the fullest protection of the law or to oppress them in any way. At the same time the cries of the people are most emphatic in demanding relief for producers and shippers against injustice and wrong through oppressive rates and discrimination. It is the duty of Congress to hold an even balance between these conflicting and contending interests.

The friends of the railroads demand the suspension of the remedial order of the Commission pending judicial investigation, while the friends of the producers and shippers strenuously object to such a suspension. It is contended by the former that Congress can not limit the jurisdiction of the circuit courts, and that the right to issue an injunction suspending the rate fixed by the Commission is inherent in those tribunals. On the other hand, it is asserted with equal emphasis that the power to create all courts, other than the Supreme Court, rests alone in Congress, and that such courts being statutory are necessarily limited in their scope and power by the authority which creates them.

I myself incline most confidently to this latter view and have not the slightest doubt that it is possible to properly amend this bill so as to prohibit the circuit courts from interfering with the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission by any interlocutory order. As has already been observed in connection with the power to fix rates, this question also must be determined by the Supreme Court should the proposed law be enacted. Amendments may be proposed to more clearly define the method of making any court review, which amendments will serve the purpose of having the order of the Commission stand pending litigation.

The Senate must determine by its vote what shall be its attitude upon the questions of court review and interlocutory suspensions. The whole question at issue as to giving relief to the producing interests of the country revolves around this feature of the bill. If any decision of the Supreme Court shall declare that Congress is powerless to grant speedy relief through a commission, it needs no prophet to tell that an outburst of surprise and indignation will sweep over the country.

Perhaps the most notable feature of the pending controversy is the fact that for ten years the Interstate Commerce Commission exercised the very power which is sought to be restored to it, and it did this without anyone presuming to deny the authority of Congress in granting the power or to impugn the justice or wisdom of its exercise by the Commission. The act creating the Interstate Commerce Commission went into effect in 1887, and it was not until 1897 that the Supreme Court, in the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission v. Cincinnati, New Orleans and Texas Pacific Railway Company (167 U. S., 479), decided that Congress had not granted to the Commission the power to fix remedial rates.

The original act was the result of long-continued contention on the part of the shippers and producers that they were being oppressed by the railroads, and the demand for relief culminated in such legislation. It is nine years since the decision of the Supreme Court practically repealed the law by so emasculating it that it has since been of little or no use to the people. If it was necessary in 1887, how much more necessary is it now. Let a brief comparison of conditions then and now illustrate:

NECESSITY FOR LEGISLATION.

In 1890 the railroads of the country had as follows:

|---|---|
| Mileage | 163,597 |
| Capitalization | $8,984,234,616 |
| Gross annual earnings | $1,000,000,000 |

In 1904 they had the following:

|---|---|
| Mileage | 212,243 |
| Capitalization | $13,213,124,679 |
| Gross annual earnings | $1,975,174,091 |

Or, in round numbers:

| | Mileage. | Capitalization. | Gross annual earnings. |
|---|---|---|---|
| In 1890 | 164,000 | $9,000,000,000 | $1,000,000,000 |
| In 1904 | 215,000 | 14,000,000,000 | 2,000,000,000 |

|---|---|
| Dividends in 1888 | $80,000,000 |
| Dividends in 1904 | $222,000,000 |
| Population in 1888 | 63,000,000 |
| Population in 1904 | 91,000,000 |

COMMUNITY OF INTEREST.

Table showing "communities of interest," or steam-railroad groups of financiers controlling nearly 95 per cent of the vital steam-railroad lines and partial control of remainder.

| Designation. | Number of corporations. | Mileage. | Capitalization. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Vanderbilt system | 132 | 21,888 | $1,169,196,132 |
| Pennsylvania system | 280 | 19,300 | 1,822,402,235 |
| Morgan system | 225 | 47,206 | 2,265,116,350 |
| Gould-Rockefeller system | | 28,157 | 1,368,877,540 |
| Harriman-Kuhn-Loeb system | 85 | 22,943 | 1,321,243,711 |
| Moore, or Rock Island system | 91 | 25,092 | 1,070,250,939 |
| | | 164,586 | 9,017,016,907 |
| New England system | 7 | 5,532 | 2,982,983,093 |
| Nominally independent and smaller systems | | 33,968 | |
| Total in 1902 | | 204,086 | 12,000,000,000 |
| Total in 1906 | | 215,000 | 14,000,000,000 |

These figures are taken from a book about trusts, written by Mr. John Moody in 1904. The following additional extracts are taken therefrom (pp. 441–442):

"We see therefore that the total vital railway mileage of this country amounts to about 177,721 miles. Of this, the six groups or 'communities of interest,' control directly 164,556 miles. They dominate and partially control the balance of 13,165 miles, and it is evidently only a question of two or three years when they will absorb most of the latter. The statement, therefore, that the 'communities of interest' dominate by direct control nearly 95 per cent of the vital railway mileage of the country is shown to be literally true. Furthermore they indirectly dominate and bid fair shortly to directly dominate the remaining 5 or 6 per cent of vital mileage, and they will also ultimately absorb or wipe out most of the 25,779 miles of small disconnected or more or less unprofitable lines.

"But there is a further fact to be noted. Not only is this enormous percentage of railway property dominated by these six groups, but these groups themselves are in many important ways linked one to the other, and the various interests which control them overlap, as it were, into each other's group or circle. In fact, the six groups, with the 'independent' allied lines, are really banded together by the closest of commercial and industrial ties. There are elements in every group which are also parts of other groups. Thus the dominating men in the Morgan group are also important factors in the Gould, Pennsylvania, and the Moore groups, and the Rockefeller-Gould interests are represented to a greater or less degree in every group and also in most of the 'independent' allied lines.

"The whole aggregation thus makes up a gigantic 'community of interest' or railroad trust, being allied together by most remarkable and intricate ties of interdependence and mutual advantage. While nominally controlled and operated by nearly 2,000 corporations, the steam railroads of the country really make up a mammoth transportation trust which is dominated by a handful of far-seeing and masterful financiers.

"The financiers who are at the head of and entirely dominate this railroad trust are J. Pierpont Morgan, John D. and William Rockefeller, W. K. and F. W. Vanderbilt, George J. Gould, A. J. Cassatt, James J. Hill, Edwin Hawley, H. H. Rogers, August Belmont, Thomas F. Ryan, and W. H. and J. H. Moore.

"Not only do these financiers dominate their respective groups, but, as stated above, the most important of them, such as Rockefeller, Morgan, Harriman, Gould, and Vanderbilt, are interested in and more or less dominate all the groups, and in this way knit together the entire railroad system of the country into this greater 'community' or 'trust.' The superior dominating influence of Mr. Rockefeller and Mr. Morgan is felt in greater or less degree in all of the groups."

Following up ever so briefly the line of thought suggested by this narrative the following impressive fact is presented for serious consideration: The gross earnings of the railroads are, in round numbers, $2,000,000,000. Their net earnings are $700,000,000.

It will thus be seen that once a year every dollar in circulation in the United States passes through the hands of the railroads, while once in three years every dollar in the United States becomes a part of their net earnings, and these net earnings equal in amount annually the entire expenditures of the United States Government. It is small wonder that, with such princely revenues, the most brilliant legal minds of the country are at their command to conduct legislation, to frame laws and to secure their passage through legislatures and Congress, and to exercise such an overmastering influence over the judiciary and executive departments, both of the States and nation, that the average citizen is almost driven to believe that the fight is hopeless and that the Government, instead of controlling the railroads, is controlled by them, and that the liberties of the people, to say nothing of their rights are in jeopardy.

It is a struggle between the actual man and the artificial man represented in the corporation; it is a struggle between man and money; it is a struggle between citizenship and capital. The final outcome will determine whether or not the people are really capable of self-government and can maintain and transmit to their posterity the priceless heritage that we have had handed down to us by our ancestors. For long years the people have waged an unequal contest, and for the most part they have been indifferent to the vital natures of the issues involved.

Many of the great newspapers of the country are owned outright by the captains of industry, who, through the manipulations of these great properties, the issue of watered stock not representing any real or honest investment, and the enjoyment of monopolies that have grown up under the fostering care of Congress, have accumulated such vast fortunes that the multimillionaires, in a few instances, are grown almost to billionaires. It is impossible to deny that this great accumulation of wealth in the hands of the few is such a menace to liberty that the honest patriot stands appalled by the outlook.

With the control of the press in many cases that great instrumentality is used to befog the issue, to deceive and mislead the people, and to create confusion in the minds of the laboring masses. Once let the people understand and know what is being done and how it is being done, a remedy will be sure and swift, and the wrongdoer will be punished, however many millions he may have stolen.

OVERCAPITALIZATION.

Equally impressive will be an examination, however brief, of the capitalization per mile of the railroads in 1886 and the capitalization in 1906. Startling facts call for explanation if it can be had. Making all due allowances for the natural increase in value of terminals located in large cities, permanent improvements in which the earnings of the roads have been invested, and every other reasonable increase in value of these great properties during twenty years, it is impossible not to reach the conclusion that there has been an immense amount of overcapitalization deliberately planned and carried out for a specific purpose; and that purpose can be no other than the foisting on the people of railroad securities which have no actual value and the only motive for whose creation and sale was to add to the gains of a coterie of multimillionaires, whose energies are now directed toward compelling the business interests of the country to "make good" by increasing the earnings of the roads with a view to paying dividends upon this fictitious valuation of the properties.

The process is well understood. The controlling element represented in the board of directors of a given railroad property meets and determines to issue more stock or more bonds, the pretense being that it is for the purpose of betterments. These are sold to the investing public at the highest price they will bring, and a large percentage of the proceeds are quietly pocketed by the inner circle of the managers, while the railroad is lucky if one-half is spent for the purpose for which they were said to be issued. The market is manipulated up or down to suit the purposes of these managers and the confiding people who have bought them as investments are in the end induced to sell their holdings at a much lower price than they paid, so that there is every opportunity under the loose legislation on this subject, or the entire lack of it in most instances, for the robbery of the masses.

This system of juggling with railroad properties has been going on for years, and all the while the real ownership and control of the transportation interests of the country have been getting into the hands of an ever-lessening number of rich men, men so rich that they do not know within a score of millions how much they own or, more properly speaking, how much they have seized from the people.

There is one question which this phase of the subject brings into great prominence and importance, and that is the relation to Congress of the increase in capitalization; whether it is the purpose of Congress to compel the business industries, for whose benefit the railroads were primarily built, to pay not dividends upon the real value of these properties, but on the fictitious value which has been sought to be placed upon them by the increased capitalization.

FAIRLY REMUNERATIVE RATE.

There is a dangerous provision in this bill which, in my judgment, ought to be stricken out, and that is in section 15, where the Interstate Commerce Commission is told "to determine and prescribe what will, in its judgment, be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate," etc. The last words are too elastic and ambiguous and can be construed to mean too much that it would be harmful and dangerous for Congress to enact into a law. "Fairly remunerative rate" on what; the actual value or the fictitious value of the properties? Are railroads which now pay no dividends because of the immense amounts of watered stock to be allowed to compel the producers who use their lines to pay a dividend on the excessive capitalization? Is Congress willing to lend itself to the schemes of the railroad magnates who have brought about this condition wherein they levy tribute on the business industries of the country and compel the payment of the pound of flesh?

Every honest man is willing to treat the railroads justly and fairly, but are not the people entitled to be treated justly and fairly, too? Are we to be driven in the end to government ownership of these great highways of commerce in order to relieve the people from an intolerable condition? It is urged by some that it is too late to save the country from the consequences of this policy of spoliation; that thousands of millions of dollars of railroad securities and bonds are in the hands of innocent purchasers, and that it would be unjust to these purchasers to have their property destroyed or its value greatly reduced by legislation along this line; but it seems to me that this plea is untenable.

There can be no justice in compelling the people as a whole to pay dividends on watered stock primarily for the purpose of increasing the fortunes of men already too rich. The poor dupes who have been led to invest their savings in such stocks can better afford to lose them than to have the labor of the country saddled with the burden of paying perpetual tribute in the shape of dividends on dishonest valuations.

VIEWS OF AN ENGLISH ARISTOCRAT.

In this connection it is well to quote the opinion of a distinguished English publicist and capitalist, the late Duke of Marlborough, in an article in the Fortnightly Review of April, 1891:

"There is nothing to control the amount of share capital a group of promoters may print. They print what they please, and they issue it as the public will buy it in the market on the speculation that it is going to receive a dividend, or that the voting value of the stock is worth so much for the purpose of obtaining a control of the system.

"There is, in fact, no limit to the power of a small ring in the United States who have succeeded in obtaining a control of one of the big through systems of communication; and the control once obtained, it is a simple question of time when they will be able to swallow up everything within their reach.

"The people who are really to be wondered at, however, are the citizens of the United States, who continue to permit such a gigantic political abuse as this American railway monopoly to grow up as it is doing in the hands of a group of gigantic capitalists in New York and other great towns of America; * * * that the American public, which prides itself on its democratic institutions, should have allowed this aristocracy to grow up in its midst, which is daily becoming infinitely more powerful and infinitely more dangerous than all the feudal aristocracies of Europe put together. It was easy to get rid of the European difficulty with the guillotine, as the French did, without tearing up the foundations of all social life in the country itself. In America this financial and railway aristocracy is slowly building itself into the very bone and sinew of the people, and it will be a very difficult twentieth-century problem to know how Congress is going to deal with the matter.

"No one who has been to America can fail to be struck with the vastness of the railway interest of that country. It represents the very life and lungs of trade, and at the same time is the predominant factor in preserving political unity of interests between States separated by thousands of miles of intervening plains, rivers, and mountains. The management as well as the mismanagement of these vast systems is one of the marvels of that great continent.

"These systems must continue to grow to meet the wants of increasing population and the large centers of permanent industry and manufacture that exist everywhere. It must be noted, however, that the great main arteries of these systems are now permanently marked out. It will be practically impossible to make new main routes, except at fabulous cost, with approaches to the coast. The strategical positions are seized and occupied, and whoever can possess himself to-day of a controlling interest in a main through route and allied feeders across the great central basin of the Northern States can not be deprived of a gigantic monopoly in the present and in the future."

The farseeing vision of this English aristocrat has drawn us a picture of present conditions that is startling and almost appalling. The problem has ripened much faster than even he considered it possible, and we of this Congress are brought face to face with the settlement of the question. It may not be possible at once to give the full measure of relief and to apply the remedy which is so urgently demanded, but we can take two long steps forward if we shall incorporate provisions in some legislation for compelling the fullest possible publicity in connection with all railroad expenditures and making it impossible for the conspirators, who are plotting to enslave the people, to issue stocks and bonds without value received. We must stop the printing presses from issuing fictitious shares.

All issues of railroad securities in the future on interstate-commerce railroads should be under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission and there should be a speedy readjustment of capitalized values of these great arteries of commerce while protecting, as far as possible, the innocent holders of watered stock. It may be that these can not be protected under the law and that the holders of first-mortgage bonds and of preferred stock, who will be found in the end to be the multimillionaires who have perpetrated the scheme of injustice, will retain their advantage, while the poor dupes who have been led to buy the products of railway printing presses will lose what they have invested. Whatever else Congress does or fails to do, the producers of the country should be relieved from such danger of being compelled to make good the values of overcapitalized railroads as lurks in this innocent looking and plausible provision about "fairly remunerative rates."

THE WEST VIRGINIA SITUATION.

The necessity for granting, at some time, relief to producers and shippers in several important particulars not provided for in this bill may be wisely considered in connection with the pending discussion. There is no provision, except a most vague and indefinite one, for the anomalous and outrageous condition of affairs disclosed as existing in West Virginia. The letter of Governor Dawson of that State published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 8 and the memorial of the Red Rock Fuel Company published in the RECORD of January 29, taken together, disclose a situation that is almost beyond belief. The railroads have seized on the vast mineral wealth of the State in its extensive coal fields and have created a monopoly in that prime necessity of life, fuel.

Landowners who wish to mine and ship their coal are denied access to market, while the roads themselves are engaged extensively in mining and shipping coal; and when private individuals or companies seek to develop their coal lands and send their product to market the railroads deny or refuse to grant them the privilege of engaging in interstate commerce. In the case of the Red Rock Fuel Company physical connection was refused. They would not permit this coal-mining company to join its track with a switch to the track of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and thus obtain an outlet. In other cases mines have had to shut down because of the denial of cars by the railroads. The coal output, in effect, is controlled absolutely by the railroads in their own interest, and in the case of this particular State the infamy of the situation is aggravated by the fact, which is practically proven, that the three railroad systems entering West Virginia are controlled by an outside road, the Pennsylvania.

There are many other instances in which the proof has been furnished of even more outrageous abuse of power than in the instance cited of the Red Rock Fuel Company case. Where connections between the mines of private companies were already in existence under arrangements made some years ago, the tracks have been torn up, and virtual confiscation of the property is threatened. Vested with the rights of eminent domain to construct their lines and granted liberal franchises and charters, the railroads, designed to be public carriers for the benefit of the whole people, in the last few years have become rapidly transformed into the veriest band of robbers—highwaymen who do not thrust their pistols in the faces of their victims and demand money or their lives, but who levy tribute in freight rates which are as high as the traffic will bear, deny access to market, monopolize with brazen effrontery one of the prime necessaries of life—coal—and in every way show their absolute contempt for the people and the people's rights.

The condition of affairs in West Virginia is even worse in Pennsylvania, and from every part of the country come reports that the railroads have practically already obtained control of almost all the coal lands, and where they have not bought the land itself they have obtained mineral leases and are rapidly carrying out the scheme of monopolizing the fuel supply of 85,000,000 people. In Pennsylvania it is charged that they have for years controlled absolutely the State government, and they snap their fingers in contempt at any and every effort to enforce the law and the constitution which prohibits the ownership of coal mines by public carriers. It will be a task of immense difficulty to undo the incalculable mischief and wrong that has already been done.

The plea of vested rights and the complications from the secret transfers, the purchase by holding companies and trust companies, the ramifications of partnerships and of trusteeships, and of other subtle agencies contrived by hundreds of the best legal minds in the country, whose services are at the command of these gigantic corporations, will require firmness, perseverance, and patience by Congress to grant relief from existing conditions and safeguard the public interests in the future. It is our bounden duty to amend this bill so as to compel every public carrier to give the freest possible access to market to every producer who wishes to engage in interstate commerce.

We should incorporate an amendment in the bill which will compel all railroads to make connections with any and every other railroad, public or private, and grant just and fair traffic arrangements, so as to put every producer upon an equal footing with every other producer. There should also be a provision incorporated in this bill to divorce absolutely the business of transporting freight as a public carrier and the business of producing freight to be transported. The temptation to discriminate against competitors on the part of a public carrier is too great, and it stands to reason that a producer who controls the means of transportation to market at the same time will discriminate against and will in the end destroy every competitor who is in the same business with him.

DIVORCE PRODUCTION AND TRANSPORTATION.

Inasmuch as the railroads are creatures of the State, brought into being for a specific purpose, the public welfare demands that they shall be compelled to confine their operations and content themselves with pursuing the legitimate business for which they were created and not monopolize and destroy the interests which they were made to serve. It therefore appears to me as a matter of transcendent importance and necessity that no public carrier engaged in interstate commerce shall be allowed to produce and transport any article for sale. Where a railroad owns coal lands it may and should be permitted to mine the coal which it itself consumes, but that is as far as it should be allowed to go.

In concluding this imperfect presentation of my views on this all-important subject I wish to speak a word of caution to the friends of the proposed legislation. Our full expectations may not be realized at the present session of Congress. The opponents of effective legislation are alert, have had large experience, and are thoroughly organized.

The demand of the people for relief from the oppressions and wrongs they now endure may be thwarted by the great influence of the railroad corporations. This influence has hitherto been paramount, and its representatives in the two Houses may feel that it is safe to refuse to redress the grievances and to continue the policy of noninterference. They may ignore popular clamor and either pass no bill at all or enact one that will prove wholly inadequate. They may palter with us in a double sense;

"Keep the word of promise to our ear
And break it to our hope."

Such action on their part will, in my judgment, be very unwise, and will only dam up the water. The issue will be made the paramount one in the next election, and those who are responsible for delay or inadequate legislation will find that when at last the flood gates of popular wrath and indignation are hoisted there will be some fine grinding done. If those most interested in these great properties will not consent to wise legislation to relieve the distress of the people there is danger of more radical policies and leaders coming to the front, with the result that legislation far more drastic and dangerous than anything proposed in this bill and the amendments to be offered will be enacted.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator from South Carolina how many members of the Committee on Interstate Commerce have united in the report which has just been read?

Mr. TILLMAN. I have not asked any of them to unite in it, and have stated in the report that it is my own individual report.

Mr. LODGE. I was not sure that I understood it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have no right to report for the committee, because of the peculiar conditions which are explained in the report itself.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The views of the Senator from South Carolina will be printed among the reports, and numbered.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill in relation to the regulation of railroad rates. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is waiting to proceed.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator will allow us to conclude the morning business?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly; of course. I will withhold the request for the present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The introduction of bills and joint resolutions is in order.

ENGAGEMENT AT MOUNT DAJO, ISLAND OF JOLO.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have received the following letter from the Secretary of War, respecting the recent attack by troops of the United States on Mount Dajo:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 13, 1906.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The account of the engagement on Mount Dajo, on the island of Jolo, between our forces and a large band of Moro robbers, in which the fighting lasted for three or four days, showed such a large loss among the Moros as to give rise in a part of the public press to the criticism that there had been a wanton destruction by our troops of Moro lives, including those of women and children. Inquiries were made of me by members of the Senate and House of Representatives in respect to the matter. Accordingly I yesterday directed that the following telegram be sent to General Wood:

"It is charged that there was a wanton slaughter of Moros—men, women, and children—in the fight in Jolo at Mount Dajo. I wish you would send me at once all the particulars in respect to this matter, stating exact facts."

General Wood's answer came to-day. It seems to me to show most clearly that the unfortunate loss of life of the men, women, and children among the Moros was wholly unavoidable, in view of their deliberate use of their women and children in actual battle and their fanatical and savage desire that their women and children should perish with them if defeat were to come. They seem to have exhibited in this fight the well-known treachery of the uncivilized Mohammedan when wounded of attempting to kill those approaching for the purpose of giving aid and relief. General Wood's dispatch is as follows:

"THE MILITARY SECRETARY, Washington:

"In answer to Secretary of War's request for information March 12, I was present throughout practically entire action and inspected top of crater after action was finished. Am convinced no man, woman, or child was wantonly killed. A considerable number of women and children were killed in the fight—number unknown, for the reason that they were actually in the works when assaulted, and were unavoidably killed in the fierce hand to hand fighting which took place in the narrow inclosed spaces. Moro women wore trousers and were dressed, armed much like the men, and charged with them. The children were in many cases used by the men as shields while charging troops. These incidents are much to be regretted, but it must be understood that the Moros, one and all, were fighting not only as enemies but religious fanatics, believing Paradise to be their immediate reward if killed in action with Christians. They apparently desired that none be saved. Some of our men, one a hospital steward, were cut up while giving assistance to wounded Moros by the wounded, and by those feigning death for the purpose of getting this vengeance. I personally ordered every assistance given wounded Moros and that food and water should be sent them and medical attendance. In addition friendly Moros were at once directed to proceed to mountain for this purpose. I do not believe that in this or in any other fight any American soldier wantonly killed a Moro woman or child, or that he ever did it except unavoidably in close action. Action was most desperate, and was impossible for men fighting literally for their lives in close quarters to distinguish who would be injured by fire. In all actions against Moros we have begged Moros again and again to fight as men and keep women and children out of it. I assume entire responsibility for action of the troops in every particular, and if any evidence develops in any way bearing out the charges will act at once.

"WOOD."

Very sincerely, yours,

WM. H. TAFT.

The PRESIDENT.

I have made reply as follows:

"THE WHITE HOUSE,
"Washington, March 14, 1906.

"MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have received your letter of March 13, with accompanying cable of General Wood answering your inquiry as to the alleged wanton slaughter of Moros. This answer is, of course, entirely satisfactory. The officers and enlisted men under General Wood's command have performed a most gallant and soldierly feat in a way that confers added credit on the American Army. They are entitled to the heartiest admiration and praise of all those of their fellow-citizens who are glad to see the honor of the flag upheld by the courage of the men wearing the American uniform.

"Sincerely, yours,

"THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

"Hon. WM. H. TAFT,
"Secretary of War."

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 15, 1906.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The message will be printed and referred to the Committee on the Military Affairs.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the message relates to the general subject of the resolution adopted by the Senate yesterday. I desire to ask if there has been any response to that resolution?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The only messages received have been laid before the Senate.

Mr. CULBERSON. The resolution is directed to the Secretary of War and not to the President. There may have been an answer from the Secretary of War. At least, I desire to ask if there has been any?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No answer has been received.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, referring to the inquiry made by the Senator from Texas as to the paper read from the desk, which the Chair correctly states to be a message from the President, it occurs to me that that could not be intended as a reply to the direction which was made to the Secretary of War, for the reason that if such were the case there would be a very grave omission in the information sought to be obtained. As I understand the resolution which was adopted by the Senate, introduced by the Senator from Texas, it related to all the circumstances which attended this occurrence, which can not be characterized otherwise, in the mildest language, than as most unfortunate and most regrettable; and the particular thing which it seems to me the Senate would desire to know would be what was the occasion for this unfortunate massacre of men, women, and children.

So far as concerns any information conveyed to us through the press, there has been nothing tending to show what was the provocation on the part of these people which led to this wholesale slaughter—and I use this language, Mr. President, which under other circumstances might be considered extreme, because we are told in the press that none escaped, and when none escaped, regardless of age, sex, or participation, it can not be correctly designated, whether justifiable or not, by any other language, certainly none less comprehensive, than the word "slaughter."

I think we are entitled to know whether it be true that there was provocation on the part of these people which justified this assault on the part of the American commander with his troops and this killing. If there was provocation for it, it is certainly proper that we should know it. Speaking for myself, in all candor and sincerity, I hope that the facts when known will show that there was provocation, and great provocation, which led to such extreme action on the part of the American commander.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, nothing has come from the scene of that action except the cables. The news that has appeared in the newspapers has been without exception from Manila, which is four or five hundred miles away. The only direct news has been conveyed in the cables which have been furnished by the War Department. The Secretary of War is absent in New York at this moment, I believe. I do not suppose there is any information that he could possibly give the Senate until enough time has elapsed to bring reports from the islands here. This long dispatch which has been read at the desk was a cable from General Wood, and I think it is the only full official account that has been received from the islands at all.

I have not the slightest question that as soon as the Secretary can have time to secure the information he will send it in as a matter of course, but until——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the resolution was introduced only yesterday.

Mr. LODGE. I know it was introduced only yesterday.

Mr. WARREN. And the Secretary of War was then absent.

Mr. LODGE. And the Secretary of War was then absent, and he is still absent.

Mr. CULLOM. The message does not make any pretense of being an answer to the resolution.

Mr. LODGE. It makes no pretense of being in answer to the resolution, and no answer can be made to the resolution until there is time to get the information from the islands. All we know about those islands in the past is that there have been bands of outlaws there and bandits who have devastated the islands in the time of the Spaniards and in our own time——

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. LODGE. I should like to finish my sentence.

And until we know the facts it seems to me it is just as well not to enter into a condemnation of the American soldiers and the American officers who have been charged with it. We know nothing direct, as a matter of fact, except the dispatch from General Wood, and when we do know the facts then it will be time enough to talk about massacres, if the facts justify it, which I do not believe for one moment they will.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. LODGE. I am through.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I simply desire to say, in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, that that is exactly the purpose, and was the purpose, of the resolution—for the Senate to have the official correspondence, and have it before it when it undertook to consider the question presented. As a consequence, the resolution calls for copies of all official communications which have passed between the War Department and any officials of the United States in the Philippine Islands with reference to this subject. I do not assume even that all we see in the papers on the subject is correct, but the Senate is entitled to the official correspondence, and that is all the resolution seeks.

Mr. LODGE. No correspondence could have passed. There has not been time to get anything from the Philippines, except these cable dispatches.

Mr. CULBERSON. There have been official reports by cable of General Wood, commanding in the Philippine Islands, and there have been responses to those communications by the War Department, and copies of those are what we insist upon having under the resolution.

Mr. LODGE. Those have been printed, as I understand.

Mr. CULBERSON. That is all we desire.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Texas allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Is there anything before the Senate which indicates the slightest indisposition on the part of the Secretary of War to comply fully with the Senate resolution which was passed yesterday upon this subject?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly not, Mr. President, and I observe from the question of the Senator that he, and I assume also that the Senator from Massachusetts, are laboring under a misapprehension as to my purpose, at least. I simply rose and stated that the message of the President referred to the same general subject covered by the resolution, and then I inquired if the Secretary of War had answered the resolution, and sat down. That is all I desired to know.

Mr. LODGE. In what I said, if the Senator will allow me, I was not replying to the Senator from Texas, whose inquiry was a perfectly proper one, and which inquiry I have no doubt will be answered the moment the Secretary of War returns from New York to the Department. He has not yet personally received it. My remarks were addressed——

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well.

Mr. LODGE. My remarks were addressed to the Senator from Georgia, who got up and began to talk about massacres and slaughters before he knew anything official whatever.

Mr. CULBERSON. That is all I have to say, Mr. President.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts seem to be predicated upon a misapprehension of what I premised to what I said. I do not know whether or not the Senator from Massachusetts had his attention directly called to what I said in the beginning. There was a message read from the President of the United States upon this subject.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I heard it.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Texas then inquired whether or not it was a reply to the resolution which had been introduced by him.

Mr. LODGE. That I also heard.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. CULBERSON. It is not very material, but the Senator from Georgia misapprehended my inquiry. I did not assume that the message was an answer to the resolution, but I stated that, as the message referred to the same subject covered by the resolution, I desired to know whether the resolution itself had been answered by the Secretary of War; that is all.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is doubtless correct. I was not, it appears, correctly quoting him.

I simply said that it was evident that it was not intended by the President to be such answer, for the reason that it failed to cover the ground which the resolution itself contemplated; and I then went on to say that we did not simply desire to know the facts of this unfortunate occurrence, but the important thing for us to know was what led to this unfortunate and regrettable occurrence; and I went on further to say that I should myself be extremely gratified if when we got the entire facts it should be shown that there was such provocation on the part of these people as justified this wholesale killing.

Mr. President, I do not presume to pass upon the correctness of the action on the part of the commanding officer. I need not say, as reference has been made to the Secretary of War, that nobody for a moment attaches to him any responsibility for this occurrence, from the fact that we know from his own statement as published in the newspapers that he was ignorant of what had preceded it, further than that he did have knowledge of the fact that General Wood had cabled him a few days previously that he was going to this place, where this most deplorable action occurred, and that was all the information he had of anything which preceded this unfortunate affair.

Mr. President, that it is a regrettable affair I suppose the Senator from Massachusetts will very cordially agree with me.

Mr. LODGE. I do, entirely.

Mr. BACON. That it is important that, if a matter so much to be regretted did occur, we should know why it occurred, and that we should be extremely solicitous, if there be justification for it, that we should know the fact, I presume the Senator agrees with me also. Those, with one other, are the only propositions I have suggested. First, that it is an extremely regrettable affair. Second, that it is important that we should know what was the provocation for it; and third, that it is very greatly to be hoped that when all the facts are disclosed it will be shown that there was ample justification for it.

If the Senator from Massachusetts disagrees with me on either of those three propositions, then, of course, we are at issue. If he agrees with those three propositions, we are as one.

Mr. LODGE. I agree with the Senator from Georgia in regretting that there should be any necessity for any fighting of that sort, but I am not yet prepared to condemn the American officers and Army.

Mr. BACON. Neither have I condemned them.

Mr. LODGE. I do not want to do as the Senator seems inclined to do—on taking up a new subject, take my first step by making up my mind. I want to hear the facts before I make up my mind.

DEPARTMENTAL INFORMATION AFFECTING MARKETS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10129) to amend section 5501 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, Mr. NELSON, and Mr. CULBERSON were appointed.

POSTAGE ON CERTAIN PERIODICAL PUBLICATIONS.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I gave notice several days ago that after the routine morning business to-day I would call up Senate resolution No. 82, instructing the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to ascertain and determine if the construction of the Post-Office Department of the law as to postage on certain publications of alumni of colleges as second-class matter, etc., is correct, etc. But after some consultation with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], and in view of the fact that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is entitled to the floor and desires to proceed in the discussion of the rate bill, I wish to say that when the Senator shall have completed his remarks I will ask unanimous consent of the Senate to call up the resolution and have it disposed of.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. TILLMAN. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of the unfinished business, being the rate bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, like the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] my speech will be a manuscript speech, and for that reason I ask that the same courtesy be accorded to me that was accorded to those Senators when they spoke—that is, that I may not be interrupted until the close of my speech. At the close of it I shall be glad to answer any question that may be put to me so far as I may be able to answer it.

I desire further to say that in the remarks I am about to make my first purpose is to call attention to what has been accomplished in the various States of the Union in the way of securing railway-rate legislation as to local traffic. I propose to give a brief genesis of that and in connection with it the decisions of our Supreme Court and to show the judicial revolution that has taken place in that court.

ON RAILWAY RATE LEGISLATION.

The man whose chief acquaintance with the problem of railway rate legislation is derived from riding in a Pullman car, drawing dividends on railway stock, and clipping coupons from railway bonds looks at the problem in an entirely different light from the farmer, the merchant, and the shipper at a noncompetitive point who is subject to high rates and unjust discriminations. To the latter it is a continuing, ever present, and most vital issue, continually pressed home on him in his daily avocation and daily experience from which there is no retreat.

Had there never been any undue exactions or unjust discriminations, there would, in all probability, have been a scant demand for rate regulation. It is because the railways of the country, to a greater or less degree, in spite of remedial legislation, have persisted, and still persist, in their exactions and discrimination that the public come to Congress to seek protection and relief.

Why have the railways persisted and why do they still persist in evading the laws and in evading the just rights of the public? I should like to have those who are hostile to railway rate legislation explain and account for such conduct. Did the railways never offend they might justly complain of the public demand, but as long as they persist in offending they can not complain because the public seeks relief. To stigmatize those who, under such circumstances, come to Congress for relief as using "a knock-down-and-drag-out argument" is unworthy of the subject and is belittling a just cause. Even those who thus taunt the public admit that there are some evils and some wrongs to redress.

In their infancy and at the outset, when the railways first sought to secure right of way through the power of eminent domain and their right was disputed, they put their claim on the ground that it was a public enterprise and for a public use, and the courts accorded them the right on these grounds. The following early cases furnish illustrations of this: Beekman v. Saratoga, etc., Railway Company (N. Y., 1831; 3 Paige, ch. 45–75), in which the opinion was given by Chancellor Wallworth, and Louisville, etc., Railway Company v. Chappell (S. C., 1838; 1 Rice (S. C.), 383). These early cases laid down the doctrine that the railways were entitled to secure right of way through the power of eminent domain, because they were quasi public corporations and were devoted to a public service and a public use; that they were obliged to serve the public, and that they were subject, in consequence, to public control.

Chancellor Walworth, in Beekman v. Saratoga and Schenectady Railroad Company, says—and I may state that this is a case where resistance was made to the securing of the right of way for the company:

> The objection that the corporation is under no legal obligation to transport produce or passengers upon this road, and at a reasonable expense, is unfounded in fact. The privilege of making a road and taking tolls thereon is a franchise as much as the establishment of a ferry or a public wharf and taking tolls for the use of the same. The public have an interest in the use of the railroad, and the owners may be prosecuted for the damage sustained, if they should refuse to transport an individual, or his property, without any reasonable excuse, upon being paid the usual rate of fare. The legislature may also from time to time regulate the use of the franchise and limit the amount of toll which it shall be lawful to take, in the same manner as they may regulate the amount of tolls to be taken at a ferry, or for grinding at a mill, unless they have deprived themselves of that power by a legislative contract with the owners of the road.

The Munn case and the so-called "Granger cases" of 1876 (94 U. S.) only amplified and reiterated this doctrine and policy laid down by the early cases in New York and South Carolina in 1831 and in 1838.

As railway expansion extended from the seaboard to the Mississippi Valley at rapid pace, the public soon found that, though they were anxious to secure railroad facilities and appreciated the advantages thereof, and were willing to bear the ordinary burdens incident thereto, the exactions and discriminations, both as to persons and places, of the railways ran riot and soon became intolerable. And this resulted in the early seventies in a great uprising among the people of the upper Mississippi Valley in an effort to secure legislative relief. The people first turned for relief to their State legislature, and these responded by enacting rate laws, some operating directly upon the railways, but in most instances, after laying down general rules, through railway rate-making commissions. This was notably so in the States of Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, and Illinois. The railways first resisted the enactment of these laws and then they resisted, through all legal resources, their enforcement on the ground that they were invalid and unconstitutional.

In 1831 to 1838 the railways insisted upon the right of exercising the power of eminent domain for securing right of way upon the ground that they were quasi public corporations that were rendering a public service and exercising a public duty on behalf of the state. In the seventies they insisted that they were nothing but private moneyed corporations and as such immune from public control. "These railways are the private property of our stockholders; what business has the legislature to say how we shall perform the service and what rate we shall charge? It is utterly preposterous. The public is utterly unfit to judge of these things. Our own judgment and our own policy are all-sufficient. What business has the legislature to meddle anyway?" This was the railway slogan in those days.

From this issue cases soon came into the courts, first in the State courts, and in due course, but slowly and tardily, into the Supreme Court of the United States. That court arose to the great occasion as never before or since in all its history. In the Munn case and in the Granger railway cases of 1876 (94 U. S.) that court pronounced those grand and magnificent opinions, famous in the annals of the court. The right of public control was vindicated and placed on the broad foundations of the common law, and as to local traffic, the power was held to be plenary and final with the State legislature, and the commission by it created. This was held to be due process of law; for due process of law is not, under all circumstances nor in all cases, necessarily to be had and obtained in a court of law.

Mr. President, it is refreshing even now to quote from those grand opinions that read like gospel from the mount. And so I crave the indulgence of the Senate in order that Senators may see the common-law doctrine laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States, which from that day to this has never been overturned by the court except as to the point that the rate fixed by the legislature or the Commission was final and conclusive.

In Munn v. Illinois (94 U. S., 113) Chief Justice Waite says:

> It is claimed that such a law is repugnant—
>
> * * * * * * *
> 3. To that part of amendment 14 which ordains that no State shall "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."
>
> We will consider the last of these objections first.
> Every statute is presumed to be constitutional. The court ought not to declare one to be unconstitutional unless it is clearly so. If there is doubt the express will of the legislature should be sustained.
> The Constitution contains no definition of the word "deprive" as used in the fourteenth amendment. To determine its signification, therefore, it is necessary to ascertain the effect which usage has given it when employed in the same or a like connection.
> While this provision of the amendment is new in the Constitution of the United States, as a limitation upon the powers of the States, it is old as a principle of civilized government. It is found in Magna Charta, and, in substance if not in form, in nearly or in quite all the constitutions that have been from time to time adopted by the several States of the Union. By the fifth amendment it was introduced into the Constitution of the United States as a limitation upon the powers of the National Government, and the fourteenth amendment as a guaranty against any encroachment upon an acknowledged right of citizenship by the legislatures of the States. * * *
> When one becomes a member of society, he necessarily parts with some rights or privileges which, as an individual not affected by his relations to others, he might retain. "A body politic," as aptly defined in the preamble of the constitution of Massachusetts, "is a social compact by which the whole people covenants with each citizen, and each citizen with the whole people, that all shall be governed by certain laws for the common good." This does not confer power upon the whole people to control rights which are purely and exclusively private (Thorpe v. R. & B. Railroad Co., 27 V. T., 143), but it does authorize the establishment of laws requiring each citizen to so conduct himself and so use his own property as not unnecessarily to injure another. This is the very essence of government, and has found expression in the maxim sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas. From this source comes the police powers which, as was said by Mr. Chief Justice Taney in the License cases (5 How., 583) "are nothing more or less than the powers of government inherent in every sovereignty, * * * that is to say, * * * the power to govern men and things." Under these powers the Government regulates the conduct of its citizens one toward another, and the manner in which each shall use his own property, when such regulation becomes necessary for the public good. In their exercise it has been customary in England from time immemorial, and in this country from its first colonization, to regulate ferries, common carriers, hackmen, bakers, millers, wharfingers, innkeepers, etc., and in so doing to fix a maximum of charge to be made for services rendered, accommodations furnished, and articles sold. To this day statutes are to be found in many of the States upon some or all these subjects; and we think it has never yet been successfully contended that such legislation came within any of the constitutional prohibitions against interference with private property. With the fifth amendment in force, Congress, in 1820, conferred power upon the city of Washington "to regulate * * * the rates of wharfage at private wharves, * * * the sweeping of chimneys, and to fix the rates of fees therefor, * * * and the weight and quality of bread" (3 Stat., 587, sec. 7), and, in 1848, "to make all necessary regulation respecting hackney carriages and the rates of fare of the same, and the rates of hauling by cartmen and wagoners, carmen and draymen, and the rates of commission of auctioneers" (9 id., 224, sec. 2).
> From this it is apparent that down to the time of the adoption of the fourteenth amendment it was not supposed that statutes regulating the use, or even the price of the use, of private property necessarily deprived an owner of his property without due process of law. Under some circumstances they may, but not under all. The amendment does not change the law in this particular; it simply prevents the States from doing that which will operate as such a deprivation.
> This brings us to inquire as to the principles upon which this power of regulation rests, in order that we may determine what is within and what without its operative effect. Looking, then, to the common law, from whence came the right which the Constitution protects, we find that when private property is "affected with a public interest, it ceases to be juris privati only." This was said by Lord Chief Justice Hale more than two hundred years ago, in his treatise De Portibus Maris (1 Harg. Law Tracts, 78), and has been accepted without objection as an essential element in the law of property ever since. Property does become clothed with a public interest when used in a manner to make it of public consequence and affect the community at large. When, therefore, one devotes his property to a use in which the public has an interest, he, in effect, grants to the public an interest in that use, and must submit to be controlled by the public for the common good, to the extent of the interest he has thus created. He may withdraw his grant by discontinuing the use; but, so long as he maintains the use, he must submit to the control. * * *
> From the same source comes the power to regulate the charges of common carriers, which was done in England as long ago as the third year of the reign of William and Mary, and continued until within a comparatively recent period. And in the first statute we find the following suggestive preamble, to wit:
> "And whereas divers wagoners and other carriers, by combination amongst themselves, have raised the prices of carriage of goods in many places to excessive rates, to the great injury of the trade: Be it, therefore, enacted," etc. (3 W. & M., c. 12, p. 24; 3 Stat. L. (Great Britain), 481.)
> Common carriers exercise a sort of public office, and have duties to perform in which the public is interested. (New Jersey Navigation Company v. Merchants Bank, 6 How., 382.) There business is, therefore, "affected with a public interest," within the meaning of the doctrine which Lord Hale has so forcibly stated.
> But we need not go further. Enough has already been said to show that when private property is devoted to a public use it is subject to public regulation. It remains only to ascertain whether the warehouses of these plaintiffs in error, and the business which is carried on there, come within the operation of this principle. * * *
> It is insisted, however, that the owner of property is entitled to a reasonable compensation for its use, even though it be clothed with a public interest, and that what is reasonable is a judicial and not a legislative question.
> As has already been shown, the practice has been otherwise. In countries where the common law prevails, it has been customary from time immemorial for the legislature to declare what shall be a reasonable compensation under such circumstances, or, perhaps more properly speaking, to fix a maximum beyond which any charge made would be unreasonable. Undoubtedly, in mere private contracts, relating to matters in which the public has no interest, what is reasonable must be ascertained judicially.
> But this is because the legislature has no control over such a contract. So, too, in matters which do affect the public interest, and as to which legislative control may be exercised, if there are no statutory regulations upon the subject, the courts must determine what is reasonable. The controlling fact is the power to regulate at all. If that exists, the right to establish the maximum of charge, as one of the means of regulation, is implied. In fact, the common-law rule which requires the charge to be reasonable is itself a regulation as to price. Without it the owner could make his rates at will and compel the public to yield to his terms or forego the use.
> But a mere common-law regulation of trade or business may be changed by statute. A person has no property, no vested interest, in any rule of the common law. That is only one of the forms of municipal law and is no more sacred than any other. Rights of property which have been created by the common law can not be taken away without due process; but the law itself, as a rule of conduct, may be changed at the will or even at the whim of the legislature, unless prevented by constitutional limitations. Indeed, the great office of statutes is to remedy defects in the common law as they are developed, and to adapt it to the changes of time and circumstances. To limit the rate of charge for services rendered in a public employment, or for the use of property in which the public has an interest, is only changing a regulation which existed before. It establishes no new principle in the law, but only gives a new effect to an old one.
> We know that this is a power which may be abused; but that is no argument against its existence. For protection against abuses by legislatures the people must resort to the polls, not to the courts.
> After what has already been said, it is unnecessary to refer at length to the effect of the other provision of the fourteenth amendment which is relied upon, viz, that no State shall "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." Certainly it can not be claimed that this prevents the State from regulating affairs of hackmen or the charges of draymen in Chicago unless it does the same thing in every other place within its jurisdiction. But, as has been seen, the power to regulate the business of warehouses depends upon the same principle as the power to regulate hackmen and draymen, and what can not be done in the one case in this particular can not be done in the other.

In the case of Peik v. Railway Company (94 U. S., 164) Chief Justice Waite says:

> 5. As to the claim that the courts must decide what is reasonable, and not the legislature. This is not new in this case. It has been fully considered in Munn v. Illinois. Where property has been clothed with a public interest the legislature may fix a limit to that which shall in law be reasonable for its use. This limit binds the courts as well as the people. If it has been improperly fixed, the legislature, not the courts, must be appealed to for the change.

Mr. President, the doctrine laid down in these early cases has not been departed from except in one particular. In that case and in the Granger cases, which were heard and decided at the same term, the court practically held that the jurisdiction of the legislature in fixing rates was exclusive, and that the court had nothing to say as to whether the legislature acted within constitutional limits or not. Except as to this point the doctrine laid down in this case is still the doctrine and law of the Supreme Court.

These decisions acted as a quieting and restraining force, both upon the public and the railways. The public, conscious of the power to regulate, became more moderate and less insistent, while the railways became, for a time at least, much more considerate of the rights of the public, although they still persisted in overturning these decisions.

The first intimation of a departure from these cases came in a suggestion ten years afterwards in the so-called "Railway Commission cases," Stone v. Farmers', etc., Company (Miss., 1886; 116 U. S., 307). This was followed by the case of Dow v. Beidleman (Ark., 1887; 125 U. S., 680), in which the court assumed to pass upon the reasonableness of the rate, and held that while the income might be very small it could not be deemed confiscatory, and hence it was valid, and did not amount to a denial of "due process of law."

In the meantime the legislature of Minnesota, in the light of and relying upon the Munn and the Granger cases, had enacted a rate law, making the order of the commission final. Out of this law came the so-called "Minnesota Milk case" of 1890, the case of the Railway Company v. Minnesota (134 U. S., 418). Here the court clearly overruled the Munn and Granger cases and held that the rate fixed by the railway commission was not final, but was subject to review in the court upon the facts as well as the law, and that the finding of the Minnesota railroad commission was not "due process of law." Three of the judges dissented and in the dissenting opinion clearly stated that the majority of the court had overruled and departed from the doctrine of the early cases.

Mr. Justice Bradley (with whom concurred Mr. Justice Gray and Mr. Justice Lamar), dissenting, said:

> I can not agree to the decision of the court in this case. It practically overrules Munn v. Illinois (94 U. S., 113) and the several railroad cases that were decided at the same time. The governing principle of those cases was that the regulation and settlement of the fares of railroads and other public accommodations is a legislative prerogative and not a judicial one. This is a principle which I regard as of great importance. When a railroad company is chartered it is for the purpose of performing a duty which belongs to the State itself. It is chartered as an agent of the State for furnishing public accommodation. The State might build its railroads if it saw fit.
> It is its duty and its prerogative to provide means of intercommunication between one part of its territory and another. And this duty is devolved upon the legislative department. If the legislature commissions private parties, whether corporations or individuals, to perform this duty, it is its prerogative to fix the fares and freights which they may charge for their services. When merely a road or a canal is to be constructed, it is for the legislature to fix the tolls to be paid by those who use it; when a company is chartered not only to build a road, but to carry on public transportation upon it, it is for the legislature to fix the charges for such transportation.

In this case the court not only overruled those cases, but also overruled that class of cases, of which there is a considerable number, which hold that "due process of law" is not necessarily limited to a court of law or equity, but may be had and take place before another tribunal.

The term "due process of law," as found in the fourteenth amendment, has the same meaning as the term "law of the land" in Magna Charta. What the term necessarily implies has never been clearly defined by the courts. On the contrary, courts have abstained from laying down a general rule or definition as to what is or is not "due process of law." This is so stated by Mr. Justice Miller in the case of Davidson v. New Orleans (96 U. S., 97):

"Due process of law" is not in all cases or under all circumstances limited to proceedings in a court of law or equity. It may, in some cases and under some circumstances, be had before a board, officer, or authority, not a court. Thus it has been held that the auditing of the account of a collector of customs and certifying a balance due from him by the officers of the Treasury Department, and the levying of a distress warrant for such balance and a sale of real estate under such warrant is altogether "due process of law."

That is one of the early leading cases on the subject, the case of Murray v. Hoboken. (18 Howard, U. S., 274.)

The valuation of imported merchandise by custom officers as a basis and for the purpose of collecting duties, though made final and conclusive by statute, is nevertheless "due process of law." (Hilton v. Merritt, 110 U. S., 97.)

Proceedings for the assessment, levy, and collection of taxes, though not brought in court, are nevertheless "due process of law." (Kelly v. Pittsburg, 104 U. S., 78.)

That is a remarkable case. A farmer living in the outskirts of Pittsburg had a farm of 80 acres. The legislature passed a law attaching his 80 acres to the city of Pittsburg, and then, without laying out or opening any streets on it, or building any sewers, or furnishing any lights or waterworks, the assessing authorities of Pittsburg proceeded to assess the property for city improvements as though it had had these benefits, and the assessment was most outrageously high. And yet in that case the Supreme Court held that the assessment by the assessing officers was final, and that it was due process of law.

The distraint and sale of personal or real property to pay Federal income taxes is "due process of law." (Springer v. United States, 102 U. S., 586.)

In that case the court not only sustained that mode of procedure as due process of law, but they held what they have not held subsequently, that an income tax was a valid tax, and could be levied in the form which it was levied under the law of 1864 and 1865, if I remember correctly.

Requiring railways to pay expenses of railway commissions held to be "due process of law." (Charlotte C. & A. Co. v. Gibbs (S. C.), 142 U. S., 386.)

The assessment and levy of taxes by assessing officers is held to be "due process." (Glidden v. Harrington (Mass.), 189 U. S., 255, and many cases therein cited. In the same line are the cases Pittsburg v. Backus, 154 U. S., 425; King v. Mullins, 171 U. S., 404.)

The foregoing and many other cases of a similar nature go to show that "due process of law" is not necessarily and in all cases confined to a court of justice. It may be had before other bodies and tribunals, so long as due hearing and consideration is given the case. Taxation is taking private property for a public use against the will of the owner and the only compensation given is that which is common to the taxpayer and the non-taxpayer alike, the protection and advantages of an organized government.

The power of taxation is as open and liable to abuse as the exercise of many other powers of government, even as the rate-making power, and there is no greater necessity for judicial intervention in one case than in the other.

I do not refer to all these cases for the purpose of criticising the court, but rather for the purpose of calling attention to the judicial evolution that has taken place in connection with railway rate legislation, and to show that the court has not only reversed the Interstate Commerce Commission, but also itself, and that by its own showing it is not always infallible.

In the case of Regan v. Farmers L. & T. Co. (154 U. S., 395) the court laid down many important rules relative to State regulation. It held (1) that the State legislature could, under general rules, confer the rate-making power upon a so-called "railway commission;" that this was not a delegation of legislative, but merely of administrative, power, and that such a commission was merely an administrative board; (2) that a court of equity such as the circuit court of the United States could, in an original suit, pass upon the reasonableness of the rate fixed by such commission, and if the court found the rate unreasonable and unjust it could enjoin the same, but that the court could not fix or make a rate de novo, because that was a legislative function; and (3) that while the courts could enjoin the enforcement of a given rate, it could not enjoin the commission from taking further action. On the first point—that is, the delegation of legislative authority—the court said in the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Brewer:

> There can be no doubt of the general power of a State to regulate the fares and freight which may be charged and received by a railroad or other carrier, and that this regulation can be carried on by a commission. Such commission is merely an administrative board created by the State for carrying into effect the will of the State as expressed by its legislation. * * * No valid objection, therefore, can be made on account of the general features of this act, etc.

To the same effect is the Railway Commission case, in 116 United States, 336.

Many railway rate cases have been passed upon by the State courts and by our Supreme Court, and in none of them has it ever been denied or questioned that such power, under general legislative rules, could be conferred on a railway commission.

In the following well-considered cases the point has been directly raised and decided in favor of the power:

Georgia Railway Co. v. Smith, 70 Ga., 694;

Chicago Railway Co. v. Jane, 149 Ill., 361;

State v. Railway Co., 38 Minn., 281;

Tilly v. Savannah, 5 Fed. Rep., 641, by Judge Wood. Judge Wood is one of the able circuit judges of this country; and Chicago Railway Co. v. Day, 35 Fed. Rep., 866, by Justice Brewer.

So far as the Federal Government and the power of Congress is concerned, this right of delegation has been settled by the Supreme Court in the Tea case. (Buttfield v. Strandhan, 192 U. S., 470.)

The case last quoted, the Tea case, clearly establishes the principle that, as to interstate traffic, Congress can confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the like rate-making power, under general rules and regulations, as the several State legislatures have conferred upon State railway commissions in respect to local traffic or traffic wholly within a single State.

In the case of the Minneapolis and St. Louis Railway Company v. Minnesota (186 U. S., 257), the court decided that a State commission under legislative authority could, in the proper case, fix and make joint rates between two or more carriers, and what a State commission can do under legislative authority manifestly the Interstate Commerce Commission can do under Congressional authority. There can be no difference in principle. And there is manifestly as much occasion and necessity for such power in respect to interstate traffic as there is in respect to local traffic. Goods are as likely to be routed and carried over more than one carrier in the one case as in the other, and there can be no more intrinsic hardship in the one case than in the other, and it is difficult to see why as much and as broad relief should not be obtained in the one case as in the other.

In the case of Smythe v. Ames (169 U. S., 466; 1898) the court lays down the rules which govern the court in reviewing the rates fixed by the legislature or a State commission. And these rules show that the court does not, as the Senator from Ohio intimated, limit itself to mere confiscatory rates. The following quotations from the syllabus in this case specify the rules governing the court in reviewing and passing upon a legislative or commission rate. This is what the syllabus states, and it is a fair statement of what is involved in the case:

A State enactment, or regulations made under the authority of a State enactment, establishing rates for the transportation of persons or property by railroad that will not admit of the carrier earning such compensation as under all the circumstances is just to it and to the public, would deprive such carrier of its property without due process of law and deny to it the equal protection of the laws, and would therefore be repugnant to the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

I read further:

While rates for the transportation of persons and property within the limits of a State are primarily for its determination, the question whether they are so unreasonably low as to deprive the carrier of its property without such compensation as the Constitution secures, and, therefore, without due process of law, can not be so conclusively determined by the legislature of the State or by regulations adopted under its authority that the matter may not become a subject or judicial inquiry.

A railroad is a public highway, and none the less so because constructed and maintained through the agency of a corporation deriving its existence and powers from the State. Such a corporation was created for public purposes. It performs a function of the State. Its authority to exercise the right of eminent domain and to charge tolls was given primarily for the benefit of the public. It is, therefore, under governmental control—subject, of course, to the constitutional guaranties for the protection of its property. It may not fix its rates with a view solely to its own interests and ignore the rights of the public; but the rights of the public would be ignored if rates for the transportation of persons or property on a railroad were exacted without reference to the fair value of the property used for the public or of the services rendered, and in order simply that the corporation may meet operating expenses, pay the interest on its obligations, and declare a dividend to stockholders.

If a railroad corporation has bonded its property for an amount that exceeds its fair value, or if its capitalization is largely fictitious, it may not impose upon the public the burden of such increased rates as may be required for the purpose of realizing profits upon such excessive valuations or fictitious capitalization; and the apparent value of the property and franchises used by the corporation, as represented by its stocks, bonds, and obligations, is not alone to be considered when determining the rates that may be reasonably charged.

The basis of all calculations as to the reasonableness of rates to be charged by a corporation maintaining a highway under legislative sanction must be the fair value of the property being used by it for the convenience of the public; and in order to ascertain that value the original cost of construction, the amount expended in permanent improvements, the amount and market value of its bonds and stocks, the present as compared with the original cost of construction, the probable earning capacity of the property under particular rates prescribed by statute, and the sum required to meet operating expenses, are all matters for consideration and are to be given such weight as may be just and right in each case. What the company is entitled to ask is a fair return upon the value of that which it employs for the public convenience, and, on the other hand, what the public is entitled to demand is that no more be exacted from it for the use of a public highway than the services rendered by it are reasonably worth.

I quote thus fully from this case because this is practically the last doctrine of the court on this subject, and it shows how complete the power of review is, and it shows on what broad grounds it is put. It does not put it on the ground, as has been intimated in this Chamber, that the court can not interfere unless it is a confiscatory rate. It puts it on the broad ground that the court can interfere whenever the rate is of that character that it does not afford the railroad just compensation for its property, which is the constitutional rule.

To sum up on these points, the early cases I have quoted lay down the general fundamental and basic doctrine of the right of public regulation and control. The Minnesota Milk case and the Reagan Texas case define the limitation upon such power, and the Smyth-Ames case describes the scope of judicial review. This case (Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S., 516), as well as the case of Reagan v. F. L. & T. Co. (154 U. S., 362), settles that the right of review exists independent of statute and establishes the principle that no legislative authority is needed to give the circuit court authority to review or pass upon the rate fixed. That power is inherent in the court by virtue of the Constitution and the laws establishing the court and can not be taken away by statute.

State legislatures have not limited the relief given to excessive rates, unjust discriminations, or undue rebates, but have given relief in many cases where the public would have been helpless and at the mercy of the railways but for such legislative relief; and this power to regulate and control by the State legislatures as to local traffic has not only been sustained as to rates, rebates, and discriminations, but also as to the following, among other, subjects:

(a) Compelling railways at their own expense to make proper road and street crossings (Connecticut). (Railway Co. v. Bristol, 151 U. S., 556.)

(c) Requiring railways to stop their passenger trains at county seats (Minnesota). Gladson v. Minnesota, 166 U. S., 427.)

(d) Prohibiting railways from relieving themselves from common law or statutory liability by bill of lading, contract, or receipt (Iowa). (Railway Company v. Solan, 169 U. S., 133.)

(e) Requiring track connection to be made between intersecting railways, so that loaded cars can be transferred from one intersecting road to another (Minnesota). (W. M. & P. Rwy. Co. v. Jacobson, 179 U. S., 287.) This is one of the most important cases.

(f) Requiring three passenger trains each way, if so many are run, to stop at stations of over 3,000 people (Ohio). (Lake Shore Railway Co. v. Ohio, 173 U. S., 285–302.)

(g) A law allowing double damages for stock killed through the failure of the railway company to fence has been held valid (Iowa). (Minneapolis Railway Co. v. Beckwith, 129 U. S., 29–36.)

(h) Requiring viaduct crossings to be kept in repair by a railway company. (Chicago, etc., Railway Company v. Nebraska, 170 U. S., 57, Nebraska.)

(i) Requiring a railway company to establish and maintain a station at a proper locality (Minnesota). (M. & St. L. Rwy. Co. v. Minnesota, 193 U. S., 52.) To the same effect is the case of Beasly v. Texas (191 U. S., 492).

(k) Prohibiting railways from abandoning stations once established (Bluffton depot case, 96 N. W. R., 81). (Twentieth Avenue, Duluth, case, 89 Minn., 363.)

Those cases never went to the Supreme Court of the United States, but were decided by the supreme court of the State of Minnesota, and the railway companies took no appeal.

It thus appears, Mr. President, that many States have secured legislative relief against excessive rates and unjust discriminations as to local traffic; and it may, with truth and justice, be said that in those States where rate-making laws have been for any length of time enforced much good has inured therefrom to the public, and no hardship and injustice has been inflicted upon the railways. The public and the railways have gotten along much better than they did before without such laws. It has proved a restraining and conservative force to both. This has been our experience in Minnesota, of which I beg leave to submit to you the following example and illustration:

MINNESOTA RAILROAD-RATE LAW AND PROCEEDINGS UNDER THE SAME.

By the act of March 5, 1885, the legislature of Minnesota created a railroad and warehouse commission of three members; first appointive, now elective.

By the act of March 7, 1887, this commission was given rate-making power in cases where complaint was made, and this power covered joint as well as single rates.

By the act of March 22, 1897, the commission was given power to move on its own initiative where good grounds existed.

Since the commission was given the rate-making power—over eighteen years ago—it has considered and disposed of the cases described in the following statement, prepared for me at my request by A. C. Clausen, secretary of the Minnesota railroad and warehouse commission.

This statement shows that the commission has considered and disposed of thirty-four cases upon complaints made by shippers or in their behalf.

Reduction of rates or other relief was granted to the satisfaction of the complainants in twenty-five of these cases by mutual agreement with the railway companies without the entry of a formal order by the commission.

In six cases the commission made orders reducing and fixing rates, and of these, three cases were appealed to the courts. One of these cases was appealed to the State district court, where it was reversed for defect of parties; one case was appealed to the State district and supreme courts and reversed in both courts, but in the meantime the railway company had made a reduction even lower than the commission originally ordered; and the third case was appealed to the State district and supreme courts, and to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the order of the commission was sustained in all the courts.

In one of the cases the relief asked for was denied, and in two cases the complaints were withdrawn.

In addition to this, the commission informally and on its own initiative, by mutual agreement with the railway companies, brought about a reduction of rates in eleven cases.

In five cases the railways made application for leave to raise rates. Three of these were coal cases, and the relief asked for was granted in whole or in part to conform with the rates on other roads. One was a lumber case, where the matter was amicably adjusted between the shipper and the railway company, and the fifth was a live-stock case, where the relief asked for was denied.

All of which goes to show that the people have gotten relief in several cases and the railways have not been harassed or oppressed.

Mr. President, this shows what the people of Minnesota know, that the effect of a railway-rate law in that State has been to afford the people relief in a great many cases, and that it has not proven harassing and oppressive to the railway companies. In fact—and that will be the result if you clothe the Interstate Commerce Commission with this power—in most cases that have any real merit, if complaint is made to the Commission and the Commission calls the attention of the carrier to that fact, if it is a just and fair complaint, the carrier will grant the necessary relief without any further litigation. That has been the experience in States where they have State railway commissions, and that will be the experience if you give the rate-making power to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

And to us, in the light of this experience, it seems, to say the least, shocking to term "revolutionary and drastic," as the Senator from Ohio in the opening of his very able speech does, the effort to give the Interstate Commerce Commission, as to interstate traffic, similar power to fix rates as is given a State railway commission as to local rates.

After many States had secured legislative relief as to local traffic, the public felt that this relief was too local and too limited, and that complete relief could not be obtained until Congress intervened and gave similar relief as to interstate traffic. In partial and incomplete obedience to this demand, Congress in 1887 passed the so-called "interstate-commerce law," establishing, among other things, a railway commission.

I need not go into details as to this law. Its provisions are familiar to most of us. For a time the public at large, as well as the Commission, supposed and believed that the Commission had the rate-making power, and this belief had a quieting, wholesome, and restraining effect. But by and by the Supreme Court dispelled this notion and belief. In 1896, nine years after the interstate-commerce law was passed, the court, in the case of Railway Company v. Interstate Commerce Commission (162 U. S., 184), intimated, though not expressly deciding, that the Commission had no rate-making power. But finally, one year later, in 1897, in a case in which the Commission had assumed the right to exercise the power—the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission v. Railway Company (167 U. S., 479)—the court expressly held that the Commission had no rate-making power. Ever since this decision the public have felt, to a greater or less extent, that Congress had not dealt fairly with them in 1887, and had not given them the full relief to which they were entitled, and they have ever since, with more or less persistence, sought to secure from Congress what they expected and supposed they had gotten in 1887—the investure of the Commission with rate-making power.

It is this relief—the relief which was omitted from the act of 1887—that is now sought in the pending bill, and the pertinent question is: Why should not Congress grant as ample a relief for interstate commerce as State legislatures have for local commerce, and has not Congress the power to grant such relief?

We are first of all confronted with the argument of the great seriousness of the case and the lack of necessity for such legislation because of the apparently low rates, as compared with the rates in other countries. Attention is also called to the great number of railway employees and the large number of bondholders and stockholders who may be affected by such legislation. No fair-minded man wants to inflict any hardship or injury on these classes. I for one am not actuated by any such purpose, and I do not believe anyone else in this Chamber is, but assume that these classes number in the aggregate, say, five or at the utmost ten million people, which I think is a most liberal estimate. Are not the other seventy-five or eighty millions of our people, who furnish the revenues and the traffic for our railways, also entitled to at least equal consideration?

On the one side stand the railways, representing their stockholders and bondholders, seeking to obtain as much revenue as possible, on the other side stand the great body of the public, furnishing the traffic and the revenue, anxious and desirous to obtain as low and fair rates as possible.

These interests will manifestly clash, to a greater or less extent. In the nature of the case they are, to some extent, adverse to each other, and disputes have arisen in the past and will often arise in the future between them. Now, is it fair, is it just, does it accord with the principle of natural justice, to make one of the parties to any controversy that may thus arise the sole judge and umpire in such a controversy? Does it not better accord with the fundamental rights of organized society and with the elemental principle of justice and fair play to provide an impartial umpire to pass upon and adjust the differences?

It is said that the rate-making power is not necessary, because rates are lower here than abroad. Granting that this is true in the aggregate, it does not follow that there may not be many isolated cases of unjust and excessive rates to be remedied and cured.

But the comparison of rates, in gross, in this country, mainly based, I might say, upon the work of Professor Meyer, of the Chicago University, with the gross rates in foreign countries is entirely fallacious, deceptive, and untrustworthy. In his estimates of rates in this country neither the carriage of mail nor express is included, items in which the proportion of the freight rate to the tonnage carried is the highest of all. Our railways receive some $44,000,000, or over, annually for carrying the mail, and the rate is based largely on the weight. No cars carrying freight of any kind earn so high a sum per car as the mail cars. Millions, too, are earned for carrying express matter. How many millions I don't know, perhaps as much as for the mails.

Then it should be borne in mind that distances are much shorter for even long-distance freight in such countries as England, Germany, and France. Most of the traffic there is carried for short distances, from 50 to 150 miles, and little of their long-distance traffic exceeds 400 or 500 miles. Now, with us it is the reverse. The great bulk of our traffic, like corn, cotton, flour, wheat and coarse grains, lumber, and coal is long-distance traffic, little of it under 500 miles and most of it from 1,000 to 1,500 miles. Such long-distance traffic of such commodities is always and of necessity at a low traffic rate. Now, it is by pooling the tonnage and revenue of such immense long-distance traffic with the high-rate short-distance traffic on other commodities, and by excluding the carriage of mail and express, that such apparent low rates for the aggregate of our traffic are figured out. The proper comparison would be to compare the short and long distance traffic in the foreign countries named with the rates of traffic of similar goods and distance in this country, and if such a comparison were made I have no doubt but what our rates are higher as a rule than abroad, and I am borne out in this by the following report made by Privy Councilors Hoff and Schwabach to the Prussian Government, which I beg leave to quote:

OUR RAILWAYS IN BAD LIGHT—PRUSSIAN RATES ARE LOWER AND FEWER PEOPLE ARE KILLED.

BERLIN, February 11, 1906.

Privy Councilors M. Hoff and F. Schwabach, whom the Prussian Government sent to the United States in 1904 to study American railroad systems, have just published an exhaustive work on their findings which is attracting much attention in the German press. Herren Hoff and Schwabach make many striking comparisons of the American and Prussian railroads, often to the disadvantage of the former. They quote official statistics showing that per million passengers carried the American roads killed six times and wounded twenty-nine times as many of them as the Prussian roads.

The writers found that the average passenger rate in America was 2.02 cents per mile, against 0.98 cent in Prussia, while freight rates nominally average 0.78 cent per ton mile in the United States, against 1.36 cents in Prussia. This comparison, the authors affirm, is fallacious, because it ignores some essential facts. The American statistics, they say, include freight carried for the railways themselves, while the Prussian statistics show only pay freights. On the other hand, the American statistics exclude high-class goods carried by express companies, which class is included in the Prussian figures. Furthermore, they say, the American roads receive immense sums for carrying the mails and the Prussian lines almost nothing, and besides the latter carry a volume of postal packages for which the American roads get large extra sums from the express companies.

If conditions were equalized at all on these points, Herren Hoff and Schwabach figure that the American average for freight would be 1.44 cents per ton per mile and that of Prussia 0.95.

The original cost of construction of the Prussian lines was 65 per cent higher per mile than that of the American roads.

There you have the opinion of these gentlemen who have investigated the subject and their reasons for their conclusions. I will offset that against the opinion of Professor Meyer.

It is conceded, and can not fairly be disputed, that the railways are still guilty of undue rates and undue discriminations, both as to persons and places, even since the enactment of the Elkins law. If the spirit of Mammon still tends to make the railways evade the rigid provisions of the Elkins law, how much more likely is the same spirit to tempt them to charge excessive rates when there is little or no regulative restraint.

We are all of us justified in dismissing the notion, if any such there be, that there are no wrongs to right and no evils to cure. If there were none, there would not be such universal, persistent, and long-continued demand for relief.

That Congress is the only authority that can grant full and ample relief in the premises can not with good reason be denied or questioned. The regulation of commerce is by the Constitution committed to Congress. This is the language of the Constitution:

The Congress shall have power * * * to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with Indian tribes. (Sec. 8, Art 1.)

And not the courts, as the Senator from Ohio contends. And the transportation of goods and passengers is, according to Justice Miller, commerce; and Chief Justice Marshall says:

To regulate commerce is to prescribe the rules by which commerce is to be governed.

The Supreme Court of the United States have settled, as fully as anything can be settled by judicial decisions, two propositions:

(1) That as to local or intrastate commerce, a State legislature, directly or through the intervention of a commission, has, subject to the limitation of the fourteenth amendment, the full rate-making power.

(2) That Congress has as full and complete power and control over interstate commerce as a State legislature has over local commerce, subject to the limitations of the fifth amendment, and that this includes the rate-making power as much in the one case as in the other.

In the light of the decisions of our Supreme Court, from and including the case of Gibbons v. Ogden down to the present day, it is clear that this power of Congress embraces the right to regulate and prescribe the rates and conditions under which interstate traffic may be conducted. It is unnecessary to quote the numerous decisions of our Supreme Court on this point. They are familiar not only to lawyers, but even to many laymen.

The fixing of rates is "prima facie," and in the first instance a legislative and administrative function, and not a judicial function. It is not the province of the court to initiate rates, but only to see that no excess, as respects the constitutional inhibition, is committed.

The only limitation and check on the power of Congress is that contained in the fifth amendment, in these words:

Nor shall any person * * * be deprived of property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

This does not deprive Congress of the power to regulate; it simply provides a brake upon the exercise of that power.

The Senator from Ohio in his able argument admits that railways are subjects of rate regulation, but insists in the face of the plain provision of the Constitution which I have quoted, that the courts are the only regulating authority. The Constitution makes it plain that Congress is, prima facie, the regulating authority, and that the only province of the court is to see that Congress exercises this power in a constitutional manner or within the pale of the fifth amendment. All statutory enactments are, in some form and to some extent, rules of conduct and ultimately subject to review by the court, but because of such right of review it does not follow that Congress can not act in the first instance or that the courts should have the initiative.

The Senator from Ohio further insists that the court can grant ample relief, and hence that there is no occasion for conferring the rate-making power upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. But is this true in its practical operation—and that is really the test? The Commission, under the pending bill and the law to which it is amendatory, can not only veto as unjust an existing rate, but can prescribe a fair and just rate for the future. The court can not do this; it can only veto and enjoin an existing rate; that is the limit of its power. The court may, for example, enjoin a rate of 10 mills per ton per mile on freight from Chicago to Boston as being unreasonable. The carrier can immediately, without violating the injunction, reduce the rate one-tenth of a mill; but this rate, too, may be unreasonable and too high, and may entail another suit for its injunction. The carrier again makes a slight reduction, another one-tenth of a mill, just enough to be outside of the pale of the injunction, and this rate also is too high, and may entail another suit; and so on the process may be continued almost indefinitely. Now, it may turn out that the fair and reasonable rate in the case would be 8 mills per ton per mile; but how many rates could not the carrier make between these two extremes of 10 and 8 mills, and every one of these intermediate rates would involve a separate and distinct restraining suit, unless the shipper would silently submit to the undue and excessive rate. And thus full and ultimate relief could not be secured without a multiplicity of suits. Now, as a general rule, equity abhors a multiplicity of suits, but in this instance the court would be powerless to prevent such multiplicity.

It is only by conferring the rate-making power upon the Commission that such an injustice can be prevented. To remit the shipper to a system of relief such as I have described, and which is involved in the contention of the Senator from Ohio, would be most tantalizing, impracticable, and abortive. It would, in substance, be like passing to a hungry man asking for bread a stone. The Senator's contention makes a plausible theory, but does not solve or meet a crying condition.

The Senator from Ohio further contends that though Congress itself may make a rate it can not confer the rate-making power on a commission; that this is a delegation of legislative power, and hence not permissible. As to this contention it may be said, first of all, that if Congress can not act through a commission the power to fix rates is, for all practicable purposes, of no value. How could Congress, as constituted and as operating, enter into, investigate, and try all the details involved in rate complaints? Unless the railways reform and become more abstemious than they have been in the past there would be many cases, and it would be a physical and moral impossibility for Congress to act. This suggestion is even worse than the court suggestion of the Senator from Ohio.

The cases I have heretofore quoted establish the principle that when a legislative body lays down clearly and plainly the rules and principles of action and commits their application to a commission, that is not a delegation of legislative power, and that the commission is merely an administrative body. I have found no decision in any of the law reports—and I have made some search for them—holding a contrary view. The Supreme Court of the United States has settled the principle involved in this contention in the case of Buttfield v. Stranahan (192 U. S., 470), the tea case. The court has in that case gone even further than it is necessary to go in the matter involved in this legislation. In that case the board not only passed upon the quality of the tea imported to ascertain whether it conformed to the standard, but the board also fixed and made the standard. In the legislation now under consideration Congress fixes and lays down the standard, leaving only to the Commission the application of this standard to existing and supposed rates.

The doctrine contended for by the Senator from Ohio would block and stop the administrative wheels of our Government. Congress lays down general rules for the disposal of our public lands, but the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior apply those laws under rules and regulations prescribed by them. Congress could not well ascertain and decide whether a homestead settler has complied with all the conditions requisite for final entry and patent. General rules are laid down by Congress for the collection of duties and customs, but their application and enforcement is left to collectors, boards of appraisers, and the Secretary of the Treasury, and in some cases their judgment is final.

Congress and State legislatures commit to the various municipal corporations and their various boards or councils not only administrative work but also much of a quasi legislative character. Here under the very dome of the Capitol, in this District, we have committed much important work to the three Commissioners of the District, which I have not time to describe in detail. Without the delegation of such administrative powers the Government would be at a standstill, although the legislative department were in perpetual session.

To me it is inscrutable why the railways, or some of them, seem to be in such mortal terror of having their cases passed upon by such a body as the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The question whether a given rate is reasonable and fairly remunerative is a question of fact, a business proposition, and not a question of law. I have no hostility to the courts. When I have not held public office I have lived in a rural atmosphere of law and made my living as a country lawyer.

We commit the trial of issues of fact in most important cases, involving thousands and millions of dollars, to an ordinary jury of twelve men, hardly ever experts or superior to the ordinary mass of humanity. In the case before us we commit the issue to be tried to a board of seven good men of fair business ability and experience. In integrity and business ability they will average well up with the great body of our judges. A judge may oftentimes be a great and profound lawyer, but a very poor and indifferent business man. I have known many such instances. Even the best of judges have indicated how important it is to get the aid and judgment of a good business man in such cases. In the case of Railway Company v. Tompkins (176 U. S., 167), a railway-rate case from South Dakota, Judge Brewer admits this. Here is what he says:

We think, therefore, there was error in the failure to find the cost of doing the local business, and that only by a comparison between the gross receipts and the cost of doing the business, ascertaining thus the net earnings, can the true effect of the reduction of rates be determined.

The question then arises, What disposition of the case shall this court make? Ought we to examine the testimony, find the facts, and from those facts deduce the proper conclusion?

It would doubtless be within the competency of this court on an appeal in equity to do this, but we are constrained to think that it would not (particularly in a case like the present) be the proper course to pursue. This is an appellate court, and parties have a right to a determination of the facts in the first instance by the trial court. Doubtless if such determination is challenged on appeal it becomes our duty to examine the testimony and see if it sustains the findings, but if the facts found are not challenged by either party then this court need not go beyond its ordinary appellate duty of considering whether such facts justified the decree. We think this is one of those cases in which it is especially important that there should be a full and clear finding of the facts by the trial court. The questions are difficult, the interests are vast, and therefore the aid of the trial court should be had.

The writer of this opinion appreciates the difficulties which attend a trial court in a case like this. In Smyth v. Ames, supra, a similar case, he, as circuit judge presiding in the circuit courts of Nebraska, undertook the work of examining the testimony, making computations, and finding the facts. It was very laborious, and took several weeks. It was a work which really ought to have been done by a master. Very likely the practice pursued by him induced the trial judge in this case to personally examine the testimony and make the findings. We are all of opinion that a better practice is to refer the testimony to some competent master to make all needed computations and find fully the facts. It is hardly necessary to observe that, in view of the difficulties and importance of such a case, it is imperative that the most competent and reliable master, general or special, should be selected, for it is not a light matter to interfere with the legislation of a State in respect to the prescribing of rates, nor a light matter to permit such legislation to wreck large property interests.

We are aware that the findings made by the master may be challenged when presented to the trial court for consideration, and it may become its duty to examine the testimony to see whether those findings are sustained, as likewise, if sustained by the trial court, it may become our duty to examine the testimony for the same purpose. But before we are called upon to make such examination we think we are entitled to have the benefit of the services of a competent master and an approval of his findings by the trial court. As we have said, those findings may not be challenged by either party, and if so, a large burden will be taken from the appellate court.

Here is one of the ablest judges of the Supreme Court who confesses how important it is to have a case of this kind passed upon, not by the judge, but passed upon in the first instance by what we call a "master in chancery," a business man, not necessarily a lawyer. We propose in the pending legislation not one single master in chancery, but we propose to have it passed upon by seven masters in chancery—the Interstate Commerce Commission.

It has been the practice of some railway attorneys not to present their side of the case fully to the Interstate Commerce Commission—and the Supreme Court has taken occasion to criticise this practice—for the purpose of getting the Commission reversed in the court by producing further and additional evidence not presented to the Commission. In such cases, when all the facts are not fully and fairly presented and argued, the Commission can not be blamed for making mistakes. If I had a case of real merit, I should rather submit it upon the facts to the adjudication of these seven men than to a single judge of a United States circuit court or three judges on a court of appeal.

If this bill becomes a law, it will not be as difficult as heretofore for the Commission, if the facts are fully presented, to pass upon the question of rate. Heretofore it has been a question as to whether a given rate was reasonable or not; and the term "reasonable" has been applied in the same sense as the term "quantum meruit" at common law, involving a somewhat complex question. By the terms of the bill the rate fixed must not only be "just and reasonable," but it must also be "fairly remunerative." And this is a distinct gain in favor of the railways. They can now insist upon what they could not always and under all circumstances insist upon before, that the rate fixed must be a "fairly remunerative rate."

And in case of a review by the court the findings of the Commission will be of great value and assistance to the court. They will surely be of more value, of more help, and of more weight than the mere findings of a single master in chancery. It is of great advantage both to the litigants and the court to have such cases first pass through such a Commission—a body that devotes itself exclusively to such cases. To an ordinary trial judge, who must give his attention to a variety of complex cases, it is no easy matter, single and alone, to take up a complex rate case, especially if he has had no business experience or training. He is more likely to err upon a question of fact than seven intelligent men of business training and experience.

The presumption in favor of the honesty, integrity, and fairness of these men can not, with any reason, be deemed less than that of our Federal judges, who come from the same appointing power. They are, in fact and in substance, a tribunal of a high order, though not technically a court; and why some of the railways and their friends are so averse and hostile to such a tribunal I can not fully fathom or comprehend.

While the bill does not, in express terms, give the right of appeal or judicial review, such right nevertheless inheres and exists to an extent ample for all the purposes of justice.

The Interstate Commerce Commission not being a court in the strict sense of the term, an appeal, in the technical sense, as from a lower to a higher court, can not be taken. A judicial review of the rate fixed by the Commission can only be obtained in the form of an original action, instituted in the circuit court of the United States, which court, if the matter in dispute exceeds the value of $2,000, as it always would in such cases, would have ample jurisdiction under the act of March 3, 1887. (24 Stat., 552.) And if the Commission has made a rate that is not "just and reasonable and fairly remunerative"—a rate which, in the language of the fifth amendment, does not afford "just compensation," which is the only rate the Commission has authority to make—then the court has ample power to enjoin the same, both by interlocutory or temporary and by final injunction; and an interlocutory or temporary injunction can only be granted upon notice and for due cause—prima facie made out—and not as a matter of course.

The notion that the court can not intervene unless the rate fixed amounts to a confiscatory rate is unfounded. The court can always intervene and stay where the rate fixed, in the language of the fifth amendment, does not afford "just compensation." "Just compensation" must, under all circumstances, be the criterion, both for the Commission and the court.

The review amendments suggested, in one form or another, all proceed upon the same theory, the theory upon which appeals in courts are allowed, to wit, that anyone aggrieved may, without in the first instance showing any valid cause, take an appeal and get a stay of proceeding pending the trial of the appeal. This would enable the railways, indiscriminately, even if a bond or other security were required, to tie up and suspend in court for an indefinite time every rate made by the Commission as soon as made, without showing any valid ground or justification for such stay pending suit, the only ground being some form of proposed security.

No such general and unlimited right of review with stay ought, under any circumstances, to be granted without—

(1) Showing good, valid, and sufficient cause for the stay, and the cause shown should, among other things, specify to what extent the Commission rate would, in the aggregate, work a diminution from the former rate pending the period of review; and

(2) Without an ample bond or deposit of money equal in amount to the total diminution in rate alleged as a ground for stay, and such bond or deposit, in case the Commission rate is sustained, to inure to the benefit of those who have, pending the review, paid freight in excess of the Commission rate to reimburse them for such excess.

Without such conditions, an unlimited right of review, with stay during the pendency of the review proceedings with but a formal or limited security, would be equivalent to saying that no Commission rate shall be enforced or deemed valid until it has also become a court rate, a most dilatory, tantalizing, and obstructive method. It would practically entirely neutralize and destroy the rate-making power which the bill aims to confer upon the Commission. We all know at what sluggish and time-killing rate litigation ordinarily proceeds through the various courts. The practical effect would be that no Commission rate would go into effect, however valid on its merits it might be, until from one to two years after the Commission had made the order.

A third course was suggested by the Senator from South Carolina, the Senator from Texas, and also by some Senators in the discussion yesterday, to wit, to deprive the court of all power to grant a stay pending the review proceedings. This could only be done, if at all, by depriving the court of its right to grant an interlocutory injunction or stay in such cases. This is a right which has always been inherent in a court of equity, upon a proper showing, and, to say the least, I question and doubt the power of Congress to take away this right.

The granting of a temporary or interlocutory injunction is as much a part of judicial remedy as the granting of a final or permanent injunction, and to take away from the court the power to grant a temporary or interlocutory injunction, upon proper and valid grounds, I fear would be held by our Supreme Court to be unconstitutional, as a denial of "due process of law," guarded against in the fifth amendment.

It would, to my mind, be very unfortunate to inject into this most meritorious bill a provision of such doubtful and questionable validity. As an earnest and sincere friend of rate legislation I trust I may not be misunderstood or my motives questioned on this point.

As at present advised—and I have given the matter considerable consideration—I prefer the pending bill as it stands. The right of review by an original action—the only way in which a review can be had—is left untrammeled; and if the rate fixed by the Commission does not afford, in the language of the Constitution, "just compensation," it is unconstitutional and the rate can be stayed and vetoed by the court, under its inherent power as a court of equity to grant interlocutory as well as final injunction. The granting of an indiscriminate and more enlarged scope of review than this, with stay, upon no valid cause shown, would not only, as I have stated, tie up all Commission rates in the court for an indefinite time, but would also indirectly transfer, in the first instance, a part of the rate-making power to the court. The court ought not to have greater power conferred on it—even if it could be done—than the power to see that Congress and the Commission have not transcended the limitations of the fifth amendment, for that furnishes the true and only boundary line between the legislative and the judicial departments. If Congress does not transcend this limit and boundary, what right has the court to intervene or trench, directly or indirectly, upon the power committed by the Constitution to Congress?

And now, in conclusion, allow me to add a few words about our brave, energetic, and vigilant President. He has been criticised in many quarters for the great interest he has taken in railway rate legislation. To my mind he deserves more credit for this than any other act of his Administration. Upon some questions I have not always found it so easy to agree with him as upon this. Four years ago I introduced in this body a bill giving the Interstate Commerce Commission the rate-making power, upon petition after due hearing. It seemed to receive scant attention at that time, and I found little encouragement. I make no complaint or criticism of this, but merely refer to it as an historical incident. The President has drawn the attention of Congress to this subject in a more forceful and effective way than anyone else could or would have done. There are some glasses so constructed that they gather and focus the rays of the sun upon a given subject so as to produce combustion. In like manner has the President gathered and focused the public sentiment upon this all-important, but hitherto neglected, subject, so as to produce sufficient legislative combustion, I hope, to pass this bill. For all this, a patient and long-forbearing public can not but feel, and do feel, under great obligation to him.

The House, in closer and more immediate touch with public sentiment, because they oftener and more directly have to "go to the country" than the members of this body, have, with great unanimity, responded to the call of the President and the call of the country. Can we afford to be derelict under these circumstances and on this occasion?

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. STONE obtained the floor.

Mr. ALDRICH. Before the Senator from Missouri proceeds, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to the fact that there are several Senators on this side of the Chamber who are preparing speeches on the pending bill and who are not yet ready to speak. So far as I know, no one here desires to speak to-morrow; and if the same condition exists on the other side, I suggest to the Senator from South Carolina that we take an adjournment until Monday. I think it would result in more substantial progress in the consideration of the matter than would any other course.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have inquired of Senators on this side to find whether any of them is ready to proceed, and I find the same condition exists here that the Senator from Rhode Island has just mentioned with respect to the other side of the Chamber; that is, that a good many are preparing and getting ready and thinking about speaking, but they are not ready to go on. I therefore see no reason why we should not give the two days between now and Monday to such preparation and study as Senators see fit, with the hope that on Monday we will resume the debate and press it actively. We are getting light every day, and I hope we will get an early vote. I do not want to press the bill unduly. Therefore it is perfectly agreeable to me to let the matter go over until Monday.

Mr. ALDRICH. All right. I think it is——

Mr. CULBERSON. Before the matter passes over, at the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island, if it is to pass over, I desire a moment or two.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was only going to make the motion that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. TILLMAN (to Mr. CULBERSON). He is not going to move that the Senate adjourn now. The Senator from Missouri is going to have full opportunity to discuss his matter.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand, but the Senator from Missouri has kindly consented to give me a moment on the rate question.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was merely going to move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next, not that we adjourn now.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to offer certain amendments to the pending bill, and I ask that they be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. STONE. I now yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. With the permission of the Senator from Missouri, I will take a moment of the time of the Senate just now.

Mr. President, on Monday, during and after the close of some remarks I submitted, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] read an extract from the opinion of the Supreme Court in 91 United States, page 72, I believe, to the effect that the act of July 1, 1862, incorporating the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and kindred acts were not passed by Congress under its authority to regulate commerce. I suggested that the authority of Congress to pass those acts was that arising, certainly in part, under its authority to regulate commerce.

I desire to read a brief extract from the case of California v. Pacific Railroad Company, reported in 127 United States, the extract being at page 39 of the volume. In construes the act of July 1, 1862, to which the Senator from Ohio alluded. Said the court on that proposition:

> It can not at the present day be doubted that Congress, under the power to regulate commerce among the several States, as well as to provide for postal accommodations and military exigencies, had authority to pass these laws. The power to construct, or to authorize individuals or corporations to construct, national highways and bridges from State to State is essential to the complete control and regulation of interstate commerce. Without authority in Congress to establish and maintain such highways and bridges, it would be without authority to regulate one of the most important adjuncts of commerce. This power in former times was exerted to a very limited extent, the Cumberland or National road being the most notable instance. Its exertion was but little called for, as commerce was then mostly conducted by water, and many of our statesmen entertained doubts as to the existence of the power to establish ways of communication by land. But since, in consequence of the expansion of the country, the multiplication of its products and the invention of railroads and locomotion by steam, land transportation has so vastly increased, a sounder consideration of the subject has prevailed, and led to the conclusion that Congress has plenary power over the whole subject.

At the time the Senator from Ohio called attention to the case in 91 United States I had a note of the decision to which I have just called attention, but the book was not accessible and it was not read. I have taken occasion now to read it so as to place the question, as I think, beyond doubt, it being a later opinion than the one from which the Senator read, and it being the opinion concurred in by the entire court as then constituted.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, if the Senator will bear with me just a moment, I stated at the time when I read from the opinion in 91 United States that I was aware that the Supreme Court had in some other cases used expressions such as the Senator has just now read, but I said they had not been used in the decision of any question that was before the court. The Senator will find that what he has read has no relation whatever to what was being decided by the court. It is pure obiter. The fact which, it seems to me, is absolutely controlling is the statute itself, which declares under what power the Government was proceeding, and the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case that I read from and in other cases, where the question before the court was what was the power that the Government was exercising.

POSTAGE ON CERTAIN PERIODICALS.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire, with the consent of the Senate, to call up Senate resolution 82. I ask to dispense with the reading of it—it has been read once—and to offer the modification which I send to the desk.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the title at least be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the title

The SECRETARY. Table Calendar, Order of Business 9, Senate resolution 82, resolution instructing the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to ascertain and determine whether the construction of the Post-Office Department of the law as to postage on certain publications of alumni of colleges as second-class matter, etc., is correct, etc.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, it will require only a short time to say what I think is necessary in explanation of this resolution. I would not take the time of the Senate to say anything, but ask a vote at once, except that some of my constituents are very much interested in the subject to which the resolution relates, and, if the resolution is to be adopted, I desire to put some statements of fact in the RECORD for the benefit of that committee to which it will go.

Something less than a year ago the publication of a periodical was begun at Columbia, Mo., under the auspices of the Alumni Association of the university of that State. It is a magazine in form, published quarterly. Application was made to the postmaster to have the publication admitted to the mail as second-class matter. This was referred to the Post-Office Department, and under the ruling of that Department the application was denied.

The editor of the periodical then addressed me on the subject, and I had some correspondence with him and with the Post-Office Department with regard to the matter. Soon after I came to Washington, in December, I saw the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. Madden, and his chief clerk, and discussed the subject with them, and also had some correspondence with them.

A little later I offered a resolution in the Senate, which was adopted, calling upon the Postmaster-General to inform the Senate whether under the construction he placed upon the law publications of the character indicated were excluded from the mail as second-class matter, and also to inform the Senate whether it was true that under the practice of the Department there was discrimination in the admission of some publications of this character, while others of like character were excluded.

The answer made to the resolution by the Postmaster-General was not satisfactory, it was not explicit, and the information sought was not given with that degree of candor and clearness which I think ought to have characterized the reply of a Cabinet officer. I doubt, however, if the Postmaster-General ever personally knew very much about the matter.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. As I understand the matter, this resolution relates simply to periodicals published by alumni associations of colleges.

Mr. STONE. This resolution does not; it is somewhat broader than that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it ought to be broader. The same complaint has come to me during several years past from churches, and recently from business colleges that publish little periodicals which are sent through the mails, and likewise a recent complaint came to me from a temperance organization that was issuing a little periodical and was having it distributed, I think, through the charitable contributions of persons interested in that cause. I think the whole subject relating to publications of that character ought to be inquired into, and perhaps the Senator's resolution is broad enough for that. I hope it is.

Mr. STONE. The resolution I introduced in December, to which I adverted a moment ago, related only to these alumni publications, but this resolution, I think, is broad enough, and it was intended to be broad enough, to authorize and direct an inquiry into all kinds of publications such as the Senator from New Hampshire referred to. At least it covers all college publications.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am very glad that is the case.

Mr. STONE. And I broadened it in that way because of letters I received and interviews I had following the action taken by the Senate on my earlier resolution.

I wish to call attention, Mr. President, very briefly to the law governing the admission of second-class matter to the mails. In March, 1879, an act was passed by Congress, which I desire to read so far as it is applicable to the present consideration. I read as follows:

That mailable matter of the second class shall embrace all newspapers and other periodical publications which are issued at stated intervals and as frequently as four times a year, and are within the conditions named in sections 12 and 14 of this act.

Section 12 is not applicable to this particular question, and it is not necessary to read it. Section 14 provides as follows:

That the conditions upon which a publication shall be admitted to the second class are as follows:

First. It must regularly be issued at stated intervals, as frequently as four times a year, and bear a date of issue and be numbered consecutively.

Second. It must be issued from a known office of publication.

Third. It must be formed of printed paper sheets, without board, cloth, leather, or other substantial binding, such as distinguish printed books for preservation from periodical publications.

Fourth. It must be originated and published for the dissemination of information of a public character, or devoted to literature, the sciences, arts, or some special industry, and having a legitimate list of subscribers.

I call attention especially to this paragraph:

It must be originated and published for the dissemination of information of a public character.

I call special attention to that paragraph, because a recent departmental construction of that paragraph is the occasion for the complaints to which I am endeavoring to direct attention.

Under that law of 1879 application was made to the Post-Office Department, by publications such as the Senator from New Hampshire refers to and such as I am referring to, for admission to the mails under the pound rate. A number of such publications were admitted; but afterwards—just when I do not know, but some time before 1893—the Postmaster-General construed, or reconstrued, the law so as to very materially restrict the publications which might be admitted to the mails as second-class matter. Under this new ruling many publications which had been admitted or which might have been admitted under the former ruling were now excluded.

There was a widespread public protest against this restrictive ruling, and in 1893 a bill was introduced in the House on the subject, enlarging the provisions of the law so as specifically to admit publications by colleges, churches, literary and scientific societies, benevolent societies, etc.

While that bill was pending before the House Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads the committee asked the opinion of the Postmaster-General as to the wisdom of passing it, and, in a letter which he addressed to the chairman of the committee, he vigorously opposed the passage of the bill. He said it would admit a large number of publications then excluded under the departmental ruling, and he feared it would result in overburdening the mails. He said if the bill became a law it would admit as second-class matter the publications of benevolent and fraternal societies, charitable societies, societies connected with churches and religious organizations, and institutions of learning, such as colleges and universities, schools of theology, medicine, law, science, etc., and he protested against the passage of the bill.

While that bill was pending and before it was acted upon the post-office appropriation bill came before the House, and Mr. Springer, of Illinois, offered the bill, in a modified form, as an amendment to the appropriation bill. This was in 1894. The form in which Mr. Springer offered the amendment was as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act all periodical publications issued from a known office of publication at stated intervals and as frequently as four times a year by or under the auspices of a benevolent or fraternal society or order organized under the lodge system and having a bona fide membership of not less than 1,000 persons, or by a regularly incorporated institution of learning, or by or under the auspices of a trades union, and all publications of strictly professional, literary, historical, or scientific societies, including the bulletins issued by State boards of health, shall be admitted to the mails as second-class matter and the postage thereon shall be the same as on other second-class matter and no more: Provided further, That such matter shall be originated and published to further the objects and purposes of such society, order, trades union, or institution of learning, and shall be formed of printed paper sheets without board, cloth, leather, or other substantial binding such as distinguish printed books for preservation from periodical publications.

A point of order was made against the amendment and it was debated at length in the House. During the debate Mr. CANNON, the present Speaker of the House, said that he was a member of the Committee on Post-Office and Post-Roads in 1879, when the original act was passed; that he was chairman of the subcommittee which had that measure in charge at that time, and was also in charge of the bill while it was being considered in the House. In the course of his remarks he said:

It never entered the minds of that committee—

The Committee on Post-Office and Post-Roads—to suppose that that legislation—would be so construed as to exclude from the mails this class of papers.

That is, such publications as were being excluded under the ruling of the Department, and for the exclusion of which the complaints were made.

The point of order was overruled by the Chair on the ground that it was a legislative interpretation or construction of the existing law and not a change of the law. The amendment proposed by Mr. Springer was agreed to, and is the present law.

Now, Mr. President, after the passage of this amendatory act of 1894 over the protest of the Postmaster-General, that officer accepted this action of Congress, as he should have done, as an instruction to him. He accepted the construction which this amendment made of the original act of 1879, and accordingly all these classes of publications were admitted into the mail and carried as second-class matter from 1894, without objection, up to about 1901. Then the Postmaster-General saw proper to change the law and the practice of the Department by a new and arbitrary ruling, under the operation of which a large number of publications which had been previously admitted were now excluded, and other publications thereafter begun, which might have been admitted, and which were entitled to admission under the previous ruling, were now denied admission as mailing matter of the second class.

With reference to the particular class of publications in which I am immediately interested—I mean these college publications—the Postmaster-General went back to the act of 1879 and construed that clause of the act, which reads "it must be originated and published for the dissemination of information of a public character," in such a way as to exclude these college magazines, on the ground that they did not meet that requirement of the law. But in doing that, Mr. President, the Postmaster-General reversed the previous ruling of the Postmaster-General, reversed the practice of the Department followed for years, and, as I think, ruled against the express letter of the law.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, if I remember correctly the Department, too, has laid great stress upon the words in the law that they must have a bona fide list of subscribers.

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. The law does not say how many subscribers they shall have. In one or two instances that I am familiar with they had a limited list of subscribers and then public-spirited citizens had made contributions and sent in names. But that was not recognized by the Department as meeting the requirements of the law. I have thought it was an assumption of the power on the part of the Department that was unwarranted in that particular.

Mr. STONE. In 1902 this same question was before the Senate, and a resolution not dissimilar from the one now pending was passed, calling upon the Postmaster-General for information. I desire to read a brief extract from his letter in reply to that resolution, which shows his position. He said:

> Directly answering the inquiry in the resolution, I have to say that the present position of the Post-Office Department toward publications issued by the institutions named in the resolution—

That is, publications by churches, parishes, literary and other associations, and the like—> is that when their contents consist wholly or mainly of matter relating to those institutions, and not of matter of a general public character, that they do not come within the scope of the law; that is to say, they have not the inherent qualities of genuine newspapers or periodical publications "originated and published for the dissemination of information of a public character" in the sense contemplated by law. Hence they may not be admitted to the second class.

> The publications just referred to are merely bulletins or circulars for transmitting information pertaining to the institutions in whose interest they are published.

I pause to say that if that is all they were, mere circulars, there would be good reason for not admitting them as second-class matter.

> The information they contain is not of a public character in the broad sense of the statute, and usually the circulation of such alleged periodicals is almost wholly to the membership of the institutions.

That gives the reasons, as I understand them, that the Postmaster-General had for changing the practice of the Department and excluding publications that had been previously admitted under the former rulings of the Department.

Under that ruling magazines like these college periodicals were denied admission to the mail as second-class matter. This [exhibiting] is a copy of the December number of the Missouri Alumni Quarterly. It is a magazine having over seventy pages of printed matter. Nearly the whole of it, as Senators may see, is reading matter, not advertisements, and most of it is original, though there is some selected matter, and most of it is matter of general public interest. Here is another number of the same magazine [exhibiting].

Mr. President, under this later ruling of the Postmaster-General all college or school publications are excluded, except such as are published immediately under the auspices and in the interest of State universities, or by what I am told the Department denominates eleemosynary educational institutions; that is to say, institutions that are not profit-sharing institutions, such as Harvard and Yale. Publications by all other classes of colleges and by college societies are denied admission to the mails as second-class matter.

I ask Senators whether publications of this kind ought, under the terms of the law, to be admitted to the mails as second-class matter? If the construction the Postmaster-General places upon the statute is correct, then ought not the law to be changed so that publications like these I have here may be admitted? It seems to me that if the Police Gazette and Town Topics, with all its chapters of "Fads and Fancies," are admitted into the mails as second-class matter, we might admit publications issued by societies associated with our great universities and colleges.

At all events, there ought to be no discrimination in the admission of publications of the same class.

I have here what I think are, and what I assert to be, identically the same character of publications as the Missouri Alumni Quarterly. This one [exhibiting] is entitled the "Wisconsin Alumni Magazine." Senators can observe that in form, make-up, and in matter it is substantially the same as the Missouri publication.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is that magazine, I will ask the Senator from Missouri, admitted to the mails as second-class matter?

Mr. STONE. It is admitted to the mails as second-class matter. I have here the Alumni Register, printed under the auspices of the Alumni Association of the University of Pennsylvania. Here [exhibiting] is the Michigan Alumni, and here [exhibiting] are the Brown Alumni Monthly and the Harvard Graduates' Magazine. All these are going into the mails as second-class matter. They are published under the same circumstances, by the same kind of societies, and the matter in them, while not the same, of course, is of like character. Some of these magazines have been going through the mails for as long as ten or eleven years, and are going through the mails now unless they have been stopped within the last few weeks.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. STONE. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if he has called the attention of the Post-Office Department to this matter, which looks like discrimination as between publications of various colleges; and if so, what is the explanation?

Mr. STONE. I called the attention of the Post-Office Department to it and received a letter from Third Assistant Postmaster-General Madden, in which he says:

> POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
> THIRD ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
> Washington, December 7, 1905.
> Hon. W. J. STONE,
> United States Senate, Washington, D. C.
> SIR: Referring to your personal call yesterday relative to the recent denial of admission of "The Missouri Alumni Quarterly" to the second class of mail matter at Columbia, Mo., I have the honor to inform you that, judged by the copy of the September, 1905, issue submitted with the application, this publication clearly comes within the class referred to in the inclosed marked copies of Circulars II and XIII as inadmissible to the second class of mail matter.
> The law (act of March 3, 1879) does not prohibit the admission of publications published by or for colleges, schools, etc., as a class, but only those whose scope is restricted to such an extent that they are merely local bulletins of personal information, and not information of a public character in the particular sense contemplated by the law.
> The claim made by the publisher that other publications apparently similar in character are passing in the mails at the second-class rates of postage is undoubtedly well founded, but this is one of the abuses of the second-class mailing privileges which this office is endeavoring to correct as speedily as the circumstances in each particular case warrant.
> The letter addressed to you by the editor of "The Missouri Alumni Quarterly" is returned herewith, as requested.
> Respectfully,
> EDWIN C. MADDEN,
> Third Assistant Postmaster-General.

And here is the circular—No. II—which Mr. Madden sent me. It is dated in 1902. It seems that an application was made to the postmaster of Chicago to have a magazine, evidently a college magazine, admitted as second-class matter. The application was referred to the Post-Office Department and denied. Mr. Madden, writing in 1902 to the postmaster at Chicago, said:

> The Department has uniformly held that publications like * * *, published by students and whose columns are composed almost entirely of purely local items concerning the students themselves, or the university, college, or school to which they are attached—no different, indeed, from newspapers or periodicals published by the employees of any mercantile establishment by themselves and for the dissemination among themselves of items of interest solely to them—are not published "for the dissemination of information of a public character" within the meaning of the law; nor are they "devoted to literature, the sciences, arts, or some special industry;" and, inasmuch as their purpose and object are not such as the provisions of the law prescribe to entitle them to the subsidized second-class rates of postage, they are, therefore, not admissible to the second class of mail matter.

Then he says:

> The claim that publications similar in character to this publication are passing in the mails as second-class matter is no doubt well founded, but the mailing thereof at the subsidized second-class rate of postage is one of the many abuses of the second-class mailing privilege which the Department is endeavoring to eradicate as speedily as possible and as the circumstances in each individual case will warrant.

Almost in the very language used in the letter to me of two or three months ago this officer admits that he knew that periodicals had been admitted which, under his new ruling, were not entitled to the privilege. Mr. President, it seems to me that after the attention of the Post-Office Department had been called to the fact that publications of this kind were going into the mails as second-class matter as much as four years ago, that ought to have been time enough to have eradicated that abuse, if it be an abuse.

When application was made by the editor of the Missouri University Alumni Quarterly last year to have that publication admitted as second-class matter, the attention of the Post-Office Department was directly called to the fact that the very publications I have exhibited here to-day were being admitted into the mails as second-class matter, and yet, when months afterwards I called upon him and wrote to him in regard to it he writes me just as he did the postmaster at Chicago four years before, that it was an abuse which would be eradicated as soon as it could be done.

I think, Mr. President, that publications of this character ought to go into the mails as second-class matter. If the Postmaster-General thinks otherwise and if the Senate thinks otherwise, then there ought certainly to be no difference of opinion or controversy as to this proposition, that every college and university and every alumni association should be treated as every other one is treated; that there should be absolute equality and impartiality in the treatment of all; and if it be true that these publications ought not to go into the mails as second-class matter, if it be true that this Missouri publication should be excluded from the privileges of the mails as second-class matter, then the other magazines of the same kind which are going through the mails should be excluded, and excluded at once; they should not be permitted to enjoy this privilege from month to month and from year to year when the mails are closed against other publications of the same kind.

I do not wish to be understood as desiring to attack the publications now going through the mails or to ask that they be shut out of the mails. I think they ought to go in, but I think the others ought to be admitted also. My insistence is that there must be impartiality in the administration of the law.

I have said enough already, but before I sit down there is one other thing. I desire to read a letter, or part of a letter, that I received from W. W. Elwang, editor of the Missouri University Alumni Quarterly.

Mr. ALLISON. Is that the magazine which is now transmitted through the mails?

Mr. STONE. It is not admitted to the mails; it is denied admission to the mails. Mr. Elwang says:

> You will, of course, be amply able to discover the weaknesses of the Post-Office Department's position, as defined in the Postmaster-General's letter. I shall not, therefore, occupy your valuable time in calling your attention to its inconsistencies. I wish now merely to add certain facts to your stock of information about our publication.

Now, I ask the Senate to listen to this:

> 1. It is a bona fide publication catering to "a genuine public."
> 2. That public can scarcely be defined as a "group of individuals having a mere personal interest in one another's affairs." That public is, rather, the entire past student corps of the university, numbering thousands of men and women, and scattered all over the globe. The magazine goes to Europe, the Philippines, Porto Rico, and most of the States. The subscribers include members of the class of 1846 and all the way down the line to 1905.
> 3. It has "a legitimate list of subscribers, as required by law." Naturally the list is not a very long one as yet—

For the first issue was only in September last—> but it is growing all the time and now numbers over 400, at the fixed price of $1.50 per annum for four numbers—not a mere "nominal sum."

In the language of the Postmaster-General:

> 4. This is not a money-making scheme for anybody. The editor receives no remuneration. The business manager will receive $200 for his work, provided the business can clear that much during the first year. The establishment, conduct, and prosperity of the magazine is a labor of love on our part for a great and growing public institution.
> 5. Naturally, the first issue was restricted in the scope of its contents to things directly connected with the university The second number had articles more general in their nature. It is our earnest purpose to broaden our scope as our strength increases. But even now we are certainly "devoted" to "some special industry," that being education as represented and exemplified by the crown of Missouri's system of public schools, the university. We therefore claim that our magazine was distinctly "originated" and is "published for the dissemination of information of a public character."

Now, Mr. President, I do not think it necessary to enlarge upon this subject. I have said enough, and unless some Senator desires to be heard, I should like to have a vote upon the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution involves some expense, and it is the opinion of the Chair that it is necessary to refer it to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I was about to make that suggestion to the Chair. I have no doubt that must be done. I think, with the Senator from Missouri, that there ought to be uniformity as respects this class of publications. I can see no reason why a publication of the University of Missouri should be excluded from the mails at the rate of 1 cent a pound and that the University of Wisconsin should have a similar magazine admitted to the mails at that rate. The only way that I can account for the discrimination is that the publication of the University of Wisconsin is an old one, and, probably, under some prior decision of the Postmaster-General, was admitted.

Mr. STONE. I have no doubt that is true.

Mr. ALLISON. And that this Missouri publication is now in its infancy. I think the number we have seen here is No. 2 of that publication.

This is a very important subject, however, taken in its larger sense. The proposition of the Senator from Missouri is that this publication, which is just beginning its career, prosperous or otherwise, has already advanced so far that it is now circulated throughout Europe and has reached the Philippines and other distant possessions of which we have more or less control.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will permit me, that has been done at the expense to the publication of a much higher rate of postage than is charged on similar publications.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; I understand that. Of course the object which the Senator has in view is a laudable one. It is a laudable object for the University of Missouri, and for all universities where such publications are issued—and they are of very great interest, especially to educated persons and those who desire to become so—that they should go as cheaply as possible in the mails. I agree with the Senator as to that.

But I do not agree with him that we are called upon to extend the privilege of the mails to these publications at very large expense to the Government. It would probably cost 15 cents, certainly it would cost 10 cents, to transmit a pound of this publication to the Philippines, and yet the Government would only receive for it a cent a pound.

We at this time have the largest deficiency in our postal revenues as compared with our expenditures that we have ever had. This arises, it is said, very largely from the extension of the rural delivery service. The appropriations asked for this year by the Post-Office Department, if I remember rightly, are about $10,000,000 more than the appropriations for the current year.

I think one reason why a more rigid rule is gradually being established as respects the interpretation of this law is because it is perfectly well known that this deficiency in the postal revenues arises from the fact that we carry second-class matter at about one-sixth or one-eighth of its cost; and it embraces practically the great bulk of the mails.

In another place, with which we are all familiar, this matter is being now very carefully examined in great detail, with a view, if possible, in some way to minimize this deficit.

So I think the inquiry which the Senator now proposes to institute is a very worthy one, and I should be glad to see it adopted. I should like, however, to have his consent to add to his resolution what I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa to the resolution of the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "character," where it last occurs, it is proposed to insert:

> And also the cost per pound, as near as may be, of transmitting second-class matter through the mails.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator will not object to that.

Mr. STONE. I have no objection to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution as modified will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. STONE. Before that is done, Mr. President, I should like to say I have no objection to the modification, but I suppose the expense involved grows out of the second resolution empowering the committee to send for witnesses.

Mr. ALLISON. It does. That requires the resolution be referred. The first resolution, without the second, would not require a reference.

Mr. STONE. As a matter of fact, there would be no expense connected with this investigation. If there should be need for any expenditure, that could be arranged for at the instance of the committee. I would prefer to withdraw the second resolution and have the matter disposed of now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri withdraws the second resolution proposed by him, and asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the first resolution as modified. The Secretary will state the resolution as modified.

The Secretary read the resolution as modified, as follows:

> Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be, and hereby is, instructed to make inquiry to ascertain and determine whether, in the opinion of said committee, the construction placed upon existing law by the Post-Office Department, under which periodical publications published by university and college associations and by regularly incorporated institutions of learning are denied admission to the mails as second-class matter, is a correct construction thereof, and, second, to ascertain in what cases and to what extent discriminations and preferences have been authorized or permitted in allowing certain periodicals of the character named admission to the mails as second-class matter, while denying the like privilege to other publications of the same character; and also the cost per pound, as near as may be, of transmitting second-class matter through the mails.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

ABANDONMENT OF WIVES AND MINOR CHILDREN.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 14515) making it a misdemeanor in the District of Columbia to abandon or willfully neglect to provide for the support and maintenance by any person of his wife or of his or her minor children in destitute or necessitous circumstances.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. SPOONER. I wish to ask the Senator who has this bill in charge about its origin—where it was drawn.

Mr. GALLINGER. As stated in a communication from the District Commissioners to us—

The bill was prepared and presented to the Commissioners by the board of managers of the Associated Charities and has the approval of the Commissioners, the corporation counsel, and other officials who would have to do with its enforcement in case it should become a law.

There are in the District, I understand, an extraordinary number of cases of abandonment of dependent wives and children, and the Associated Charities, which is doing a remarkable work here by voluntary contributions, has taken up this matter and has urged it upon me personally for several years. I said to them if they would have drawn a proper law, which I myself did not feel competent to draw, we would give it consideration. It went to the House first, and they have passed the bill. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. GEARIN], who is not here to-day, gave it very careful consideration and reported to the committee that he thought it was in good form, and that there could be no objection to it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TERMS OF COURT AT EUREKA, CAL.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 15521) establishing regular terms of the United States circuit and district courts of the northern district of California at Eureka, Cal.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER DAM AT PIKE RAPIDS, MINNESOTA.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill (S. 4726) permitting the building of a dam across the Mississippi River at or near Pike Rapids, in Morrison County, Minn.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GRANT OF LANDS TO DURANGO, COLO.

Mr. PATTERSON. I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration the bill (S. 2188) granting to the city of Durango, in the State of Colorado, certain lands therein described for water reservoirs.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 2, line 13, before the word "Tempest," to strike out "local meridian" and insert "location monument;" so as to read:

United States location monument Tempest bears, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 20, after the word "or, to strike out "Lake United States, or under" and insert "Lakeside Lake, subject to;" so as to read:

Reservoir No. 3, or Lake Lily, and reservoir No. 4, or Lakeside Lake, subject to any former grant or conveyance.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 7, after the word "utilize," to insert "protect from pollution;" so as to read:

And in making such improvements as may be necessary to store, utilize, protect from pollution, and enjoy the waters, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MAJ. GEORGE E. PICKETT.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill (H. R. 14467) for the relief of Capt. George E. Pickett, paymaster, United States Army.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 4, before the name "George E. Pickett," to strike out "Captain" and insert "Major;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Maj. George E. Pickett, paymaster, United States Army, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,456.17.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Maj. George E. Pickett, paymaster, United States Army."

DONATION OF OBSOLETE CANNON TO UNIVERSITY OF IDAHO.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 4423) providing for the donation of condemned cannon to the University of Idaho.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 5, before the word "cannon," to strike out "condemned" and insert "obsolete;" and after the word "cannon," in the same line, to insert "with their carriages and equipments;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to turn over to the University of Idaho, at Moscow, Idaho, two obsolete cannon, with their carriages and equipments, now in possession of said University of Idaho, to become the property of the said university for ornamentation of the grounds of the said university.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill providing for the donation of obsolete cannon, with their carriages and equipments, to the University of Idaho."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 115) amending joint resolution instructing the Interstate Commerce Commission to make examinations into the subject of railroad discriminations and monopolies, and report on the same from time to time, approved March 7, 1906; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 51) to create a juvenile court in and for the District of Columbia; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa asks for the regular order.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. ALLISON. I will for the purpose I think the Senator has in view, namely, to ask for the consideration of pension bills.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected pension bills on the Calendar, and also unobjected bills to correct military records.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. FULTON. I wish simply to make a report from the Committee on Claims.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Before that is done, the Chair wishes to lay before the Senate a House joint resolution.

Mr. FULTON. Very well.

RAILROAD DISCRIMINATIONS AND MONOPOLIES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 115) amending joint resolution instructing the Interstate Commerce Commission to make examinations into the subject of railroad discriminations and monopolies, and report on the same from time to time, approved March 7, 1906; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. TILLMAN. Ordinarily, of course, the joint resolution would go to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, but it relates to a matter with which the Senate is very familiar. I spoke on it three days ago. I refer to the President's message about giving additional power to the Interstate Commerce Commission. While there was a difference of opinion, as there almost always is when I have controversies with my friends here, and I do not believe there is any necessity for any additional power, I have conferred with members of the Interstate Commerce Committee, and we would like to have the joint resolution taken up and put on its passage without reference. I ask unanimous consent that that be done.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. SPOONER. Let the joint resolution be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That joint resolution instructing the Interstate Commerce Commission to make examinations into the subject of railroad discriminations and monopolies, and report on the same from time to time, approved March 7, 1906, is hereby amended by adding the following thereto:

Ninth. To enable the Commission to perform the duties required and accomplish the purposes declared herein, the Commission shall have and exercise under this joint resolution the same power and authority to administer oaths, to subpœna and compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence, and to obtain full information, which said Commission now has under the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, and acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto now in force or may have under any like statute taking effect hereafter. All the requirements, obligations, liabilities, and immunities imposed or conferred by said act to regulate commerce and by "An act in relation to testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission in cases under or connected with an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and amendments thereto," approved February 11, 1893, shall also apply to all persons who may be subpœnaed to testify as witnesses or to produce documentary evidence in pursuance of the authority herein conferred.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I merely desire to say a word. I am still of the opinion that no additional power is necessary, because the Commission already has the power, but inasmuch as the President has cast suspicion on the authority, and the parties to be investigated will take advantage of that and will go into court with the great prestige of his name and influence to resist the efforts of the Commission, I think we had better pass the joint resolution so as to put the matter at rest once for all.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I am still of the opinion that the original joint resolution was entirely defective, and without the amendment made to it by the House of Representatives would have failed to accomplish the purpose which was intended by its author and by the Senate. Therefore, as it has been corrected and put in a form in which it will probably be efficient, I hope it will be passed without further delay.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CUSTER COUNTY, MONT.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. FULTON. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4736) for the relief of the county of Custer, State of Montana, to report it favorably without amendment.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. LODGE. A good many of us have been cut off, and I do not see why these constant exceptions should be made.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest that this is a House bill.

Mr. LODGE. We all have bills we would like to have passed.

Mr. CARTER. I withdraw the request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go to the Calendar.

GALON S. CLEVENGER.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1056) granting a pension to Galon S. Clevenger having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

P. J. McCUMBER,
N. B. SCOTT,
JAS. P. TALIAFERRO,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

H. C. LOUDENSLAGER,
GEORGE R. PATTERSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION AND MILITARY RECORD BILLS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I now renew my request that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected pension bills on the Calendar and also unobjected bills to remove military disabilities or to correct military records.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected pension cases and unobjected cases correcting military records. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ALEXANDER J. M'DONALD.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is a bill correcting a military record which I would ask action upon later, but as I must necessarily leave the Chamber, I will ask that it be considered now. It was reported this morning.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire for the purpose of calling up the bill indicated by him.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4957) to correct the military record of Alexander J. MacDonald. It comes under the order.

Jones, late of Company B, Ninth Regiment New Jersey Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $16 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

Mr. KEAN. I will state to the Senate that this widow is totally blind and, I think, is entitled to a pension of $25, as originally proposed in the bill. The amendment of the committee would give a very small sum for a person totally blind.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is almost impossible to immediately give the reasons for the rate being fixed at a certain amount. We follow rather strictly certain rules. It will be seen that this was not the war widow of a soldier, but she was married somewhere about 1870, was she not?

Mr. KEAN. She was married to the soldier September 21, 1861, and is now 69 years of age and is totally blind.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then I had in mind another bill. I will ask the Senate to pass this bill over and go on with others, and I will look at it and give the Senator the reasons for the action of the committee.

Mr. KEAN. Very well; let it be passed over without prejudice.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. KEAN subsequently said: The Senator from North Dakota is now ready to return to the bill (S. 337) granting an increase of pension to Lydia Ann Jones.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment of the committee, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "sixteen."

Mr. KEAN. I trust the Senator from North Dakota will not insist on that amendment. The widow is totally blind and is entirely destitute.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply wish to say in reference to the amount allowed in this case that, as will be seen by the report, the soldier enlisted April 23, 1861, and served until July 31, 1861, a period of a few days more than three months. He reenlisted again in March, 1865, and served about another three months.

Mr. KEAN. When he was honorably discharged.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; when he was honorably discharged. So his service during the war period was probably but a little over three months.

It has been the rule of the committee to consider the length of service of a soldier as one of the features in fixing the amount of pension that will be granted to him by a private bill. The soldier would have been allowed under this showing about $30 per month. It has been our rule to grant the widow about half what would ordinarily be granted the soldier. The law itself recognizes about that distinction throughout.

I have no objection, from the Senator's statement to me a short time ago, to strike out "twenty-five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty," if the Senator from New Jersey will accept it.

Mr. KEAN. I agree to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.
